A like account should be kept with the herd of cows, or, better still, if practicable, with each one separately. If any one of the herd entails a loss upon you, dispose of her. Keep a strict account with the orchard if you have one, and if you have not set one out at once if you have a suitable location. Debit it with the labor employed in its care, the harvesting of its fruit and the dressing used upon it. Credit it with the value of its golden product, and learn from the balance on the right side of the ledger that it is one of your best friends.

Having learned to calculate the cost of the products of the farm, the next business requisite is to know how to sell the surplus. Make a study of the markets and learn for yourselves the prices of the things you wish to sell. If you cannot fix your own price you can at least prevent being taken advantage of by unscrupulous traders. If the market price of an article is to-day below what it costs you to produce it, then calculate from all the information within your reach what the prospects for the future may be. Ask yourselves these questions: What is the visible supply and what the probable demand? How much of this product have other countries to pour into our markets? How much will the article I wish to sell shrink or deteriorate by keeping? Exercise your reason and bring to bear upon the subject your best business faculties, and then decide whether the prospect is better to wait or sell now.

To sum up in a word. The successful farmer must know how to raise good crops, how to figure their exact cost, how and when to sell. He must ever be on the alert for every iota of information that pertains to his calling.

Things to Avoid.

Northwestern Agriculturist.

Mark M. Pomeroy, commonly known as "Brick," does not claim to be a farmer, but he has evidently stood where he could look on with both eyes open. He mentions the following things that he would not do if he were a farmer: Sleep on an old packed straw bed when there was clean, bright straw to be had. Spend even one hour idly in town till we had wood and kindling cut and piled near the kitchen stove to last at least six weeks ahead as a foundation, below which the wood pile should not drop. Compel our children to eat from soiled dishes, and thus educate them to slovenliness. Break our backs on feats of strength to see which neighbor could lift the most, then grunt for a month, and let our wife lug a swill pail to and fro. Borrow any tools or other articles unless the owner would agree to come for them and take them home after we are through with them. Pile or hang soiled clothes in a bedroom till it smelled like a sheep washing. Let the calf chew harness except it belonged to a visitor we never wished to see again. Spend more for beer than for books, or more for tobacco than for newspapers. Never give a note to any man if we could help it, and never sign a contract with a stranger. Drop tools, etc., where they were used, and thus spend an hour or a day hunting for them. Never ask or expect our children to cut wood, hoe, mow or do any kind of farm work except with the best of tools in good order, lest they tire of farm life and go to the devil across lots. Would have no more land to cultivate than we could keep entirely from weeds. Never leave a horse standing in a storm, or out in the cold while we were in town. Never have more animals than we had good shelter for. Never breed others than the best of animals we could obtain for stock purposes. Never fail to take an active interest in the efficiency of the public school. Never neglect to vote, and this according to judgment, without regard to prejudice.

MR. SPEAKER: In behalf of and in the name of the republicans of Southwestern Minnesota, I desire, sir, to present as their paramount choice for a seat in the highest legislative body on earth, the Senate of the United States, the name of a man who needs no introduction to the people of Minnesota. A man whose name has been favorably connected with the highest official station on earth—President of the United States. A man who comes of a family of statesmen and patriots. A man great among giants. A man who has done and is doing as much for Minnesota as any man within its borders. A man who would be the peer of any member of the Senate. A man whose long congressional career and large knowledge of public affairs render him peculiarly well fitted to fill and adorn the position. A man worthy of the highest office which the North Star State has the power to bestow. A man under whose vest beats as warm and true and generous and loyal a heart as ever beat in man's bosom. A man who is the friend and patron of the poor, in whom all the people may safely rely. A man who is true as steel to all men—true to his friends, true to himself, true to his country, true to his God—the name, sir, of the Hon. William D. Washburn, of Minneapolis. In the cry of the campaign he so nobly helped us to win—What's the matter with Mr. Washburn? He's all right, you bet! And he is going to be the next Senator elect from Minnesota.

Knute Nelson's Home.

Translated for the Pioneer Press from the Fa edrelandet og Emigranten.

About three-quarters of a mile from Alexandria stands, near the main road, a nice cottage with a small barn and corn crib. A good distance from the house, and sheltered by the timber, is a big, fine barn, well filled with hay. In the basement are excellent stables for the big herd of horses and cattle which now, as the weather is very fine, are out in the yard adjoining the big pasture. Having passed the cottage the road turns, and on both sides there are well cultivated fields. A little further on the road goes over a long and wide meadow through which a long ditch is dug. This is Knute Nelson's farm, to which he will retire as soon as the next session of congress is over, as he now positively has decided to withdraw from political life. The farm contains 520 acres of land, of which eighty-five are cultivated, having been cleared out of the woods which still encircle the fields and meadows. In summer the surroundings must be exceedingly fine, although it is beautiful here even to-day, with the light covering of snow in the woods and on the fields.

Knute Nelson has, as already stated, decided to retire from politics. That he means what he says, any one who has had an opportunity to converse with him will readily understand. That this, his decision, is to regretted, and especially so by our nationality, for whom he has made an able and respected representative, is true, but as he has made up his mind to do so, and as his decision cannot be shaken, we shall have to submit to it, and can only express regret thereat.

Glyndon News: Since it is shown in the election that the republican party is really a giant, let that suffice. Its policy should be firm, but steady. It is old enough to be conservative and just—ruling with moderation, as befits a time of peace and industrial prosperity.

Duluth Tribune: The speakership contest in this state, so well-informed politicians say, lies between D. F. Morgan, of southern Minnesota, and Col. C. H. Graves, of this city. The leading politicians are pretty nearly all in his favor—and it is 'in the books' that he is to be elected. Merriam, Washburn, Sabin, Davis, Evens and other leaders of the republican party are in favor of the election of the Duluth candidate. The colonel undoubtedly has the call on the speakership.

Fergus Falls Journal: No man has been mentioned for speaker who represents so many qualifications for the office as Col. C. H. Graves, of Duluth, and we hope to see him preside over the house. His chief opponent seems to be D. F. Morgan, of Albert Lea. South Minnesota, which has five times as many representatives, will probably unite on him and thus continue their grip upon the affairs of the state. It is a fact worth noticing that Col. Graves is the sole representative of 75,000 people, while Mr. Morgan and his colleague represent less than 15,000. Such are the inequalities of our apportionment. Northern Minnesota should back Col. Graves and see if this injustice cannot be remedied.

The Weekly Pioneer Press, the best family paper in the wess, can be secured for 6 months and a copy of the wonderful picture by Rosa Bonheur, "The Horse Fair," 34 inches long by 20 inches wide, by sending 50 cents to the Pioneer Press Co., St. Paul, Minn.

Notes and Comments.

Ed. Hoard's Dairyman:—The question is constantly coming up: "Why not raise roots and feed in place of silage? It will be the cheaper." I have my serious doubts of this, after seeing my neighbor fail two years with his beets, succeed twice, and lost all of one of these two by decay. Thirty tons of beets or mangolds per acre is a big crop, and at that, only now and then a man can succeed in growing them; when all men if they will plan, and work as much on corn, as they must on the beets, will have thirty tons of fodder corn per acre. Ton for ton the fodder corn is worth about one-half more to feed than the beet.

This is on a basis of fodder corn that contains no grain. Now if we raise this fodder as we should, fully one-eighth of its weight will be made up of corn ears, that would be worth $25, in addition to the feeding value of the roots. Reduced to "dry measure," the 30 tons of roots would have 4,948 pounds of dry digestible matter, or nutriment, while the 30 tons of corn, without the ears, would have 11,634 pounds. Without changing the tons, let us substitute these 3,600 pounds of corn ears worth $25 to this fodder rated as dry substance, the root crop it is seen is left high and dry, even on the chemists report, with the cow yet to hear from. I have never seen root raising placed below 4 cents per bushel, and when it comes to pitting, etc, etc, the labor equals the silo. Prof. Sanborn makes the case even worse than this, for he finds on trial, that a ton of well cured corn stalks has the feeding results of two tons of mangolds, or beets.

Assuming that beets can be raised every year at 4 cents per bushel, let us see what it cost to raise silage against it. This year I raised eleven acres of B. & W. silage corn. It was thinly planted and eared very heavily, about 100 bushels per acre on trial stooks. The cost of raising the crop was $8.00. The cost of cutting and silo filling was $7.29 per acre. The yield was twenty seven full two horse loads per acre. Assuming that they only weighed one ton per load after silo shrinkage, and forty pounds of the silage made a bushel, have then fifty bushels per ton, or 1,350 bushels per acre, of which one-seventh or better, would be corn ears—3,600 pounds—this sum divided by $15.39, the cost all told per acre would make the silage in the pits cost 1 1-8 cents per bushel. Now if Prof. Sanborn is right, we have a feeding value from this acre equal to over 2,600 bushels of beets per acre. That's a matter for the man on his knees weeding beets to think of, while his silo neighbor is cultivating fodder corn with two horses, while he drives with an umbrella over his head.

I, for one, am anxious to hear how John Boyd ripens cream. The oil test is showing that we have churned in the past, just about as knowingly as we have judged cows by the weight of milk they give. Now we must learn to ripen cream by some method, so that the churnable fat will all come at the same time. How often we hear some good wife remark as she finished up a churning of mixed cream, "How rich that buttermilk looks; don't believe half the cream came." When for a fact, I dare say 30 per cent, of the butter was yet unchurned. Granting that ripened cream is only pleasantly acid cream, the point to know is, how to make this ripening uniform. Mr. Boyd would have us understand that ripening cream was not souring or ageing. If we promote it by adding either sour milk, or butter milk, then we admit that it is simply lactic acid that we want. It may be that we do not want either "age" or acidity, simply something to "cut" the albuminous serum that surrounds each pellet of butter and so loosen it from its embrace. I am a little afraid that the secret when told will be, Jersey cows and submerged cans, and that to be successful we shall all have to make a new start in dairying. But please give us the receipt for ripened cream.

From a little experience I think you are wholly right, Mr. Editor, in advising the use or hot water in setting late fall and winter milk, and I would do so even if using a submerged, or other cold setter. The water itself would be an absorber of any odors that might be in the milk. I know of several who put water at 100 degrees into milk when set away, and who report that the cream rises nicer, more of it, and the butter comes better. If it is true that there is more butter, then it confirms what Dr. Babcock holds as facts about the viscosity of milk. I apprehend that in cold setting, where water was used, the milk would cool better, i. e., throw off its heat more readily, and would be better in shallow, air setting. The air being a poor conductor of heat, as compared with water, holds the temperture of the milk longer and gives not only a more fluid medium through which the butter globules pass upward, but give them more time to do so before the viscosity of the serums should overpower the smaller globules and carry them down when they would otherwise go up.

The question is fast presenting itself about the development of heat in silos, whether or nor it is needed, if the corn is allowed to go uncut until it has passed into the dented stage. Two or three instances of last year's filling go to show that where corn was fully matured, and dented before going into the silo, the heating showed no superiority in the subsequent silage over the continuous filling. At the close, three days was allowed to elapse for the silo contents to settle and throw out the imprisoned air, when cutting was resumed to fill up the silo, when after another three days wait the covers were put on, and what would be known as actual sweet silage, with molasses flavor came out in feeding. Some are now holding, I see, that when corn fodder has passed into the complete or matured stage, that there is not the need of cooking to kill bacteria as when the stalks are filled with juice that has but little of the starch and suger that it afterwards does when its task of feeding the ear is completed. Here is a point that we could all wish Prof. Henay to throw us a ray of light.

J. Mc L. Smith makes a poor showing in the Breeder's Gazette for the Red Polled cow as competitor with the Jerseys and Guernseys. The fact that there are poor cows in these breeds does not help his case, for the same proportion of poor cows will be found among the Red Poll list, and with this disadvantage, that while he brings one or more of his best cows with a record, two to one can be brought fom the butter breeds that will show "twice and a half" more butter per week, on the same feed, and at the end of a long career the beef of the Jersey would bring just as much per pound at the sausage foctory, as that of the Red Palled cow, that had carried her 200 pounds of extra beef all these years to sell once; while the other cow had left hundreds of pounds of butter along the path, and at last sold within $5.00 as much as the other. That's why we do not propose to paint our dairy red.

The heresy of attempting to fatten an old cow that for a dozen years or more has been a great performer in the dairy, is costing money, that wants to be stoped. The old cow sells within $6 to $8 as much to the soap boiler man, as the fattened (?) one does to the butcher for a packer. It takes from $10 to $15 in extra feed and meal to make their ribs "slippery." If this cow was sold for $10, or even $8, and this extra feed given to the balance of the herd between grass and hay, the farmer would have two dollars in the end where he don't come out even by the other method. It don't pay to be too speculative on cow beef after it is 15 years old.

A noted cheese dealer, one who runs several factories, told me the other day, that he lost heavily on his venture all the season up to September 1st. The milk did not "make up" to calculations and the feed being more "flashy," the milk was not No. 1 in quality. "Why did you not put the Short test into your factories, and buy milk by quality, and not by weight, then you would know every morning just what cheese there was in your milk vats? He confessed that he had not known of any such invention. How could you tell by the butter fats? It was a wonder that a cow could not give more cheese in her milk than butter! We talk sometimes about the ignorance of patrons, and the general stupidity of men, and sometimes his helpmeet; but here was a man, manufacturer of cheese, owner of 100 cows of his own, not knowing of milk, its values, or that it was the solids in milk that determined its value. The same tune on another string that "dairying does not pay." It won't, said my neighbor, yesterday, "if we bore with a pod auger."

Education of Farmers.

W. H. C., in National Live Stock Journal.

Not long ago the writer was riding over rugged, yet picturesque hills in an eastern state, with a friend, who said, as we passed a farm house, "the winter I came to town S. C. wintered over one hundred head of cattle on this farm." Contrast then and now. The meadow land had been sold, the whole farm put into grass, and this "let out at halves." The house and barn were habitable, but where has the farm gone to? Such is but a picture of many of our eastern farms. The young folks have gone. They were obliged to be up early in the morning, work hard until school time, travel some distance to school, hasten home only to put on frock and overalls, and when tired, cold, and cheerless, spend the evening at home, where father and mother were too busy planning how the next day they might obtain the most money for their work, to enter in and make the evening pleasant and comfortable. They soon declared that farming was poor business, and off to the cities they went, and do we wonder, under such circumstances! As years rolled on, father and mother grew less and less able to cary on the place; but no son returned; the farm had no attraction. To my western readers this may seem overdone, but the east is full of just such homes. Happily the tide is turning. Why? Simply through education.

The boys that left those farm homes have begun to feel that, after all, the farm was the basis of their prosperity. It gave them the common sense that enabled them to battle their way and gain a foothold amid the buzz and hum of city life. After a season's schooling, their sons are sent to visit grandfather and grandmother at the old homestead. To them are new incentives seen in every frisk and frolic of the lambs and calves. Some of these grandchildren are so much pleased that they are willing, after school days are over, to go and take the old homestead, which by this time may have been left to their fathers. By their training they are enabled to better manage their farms, and though sneered at for "book farming," they soon prove their superiority and become not only progressive farmers, but useful and influential members of the community.

The experience of one who is fresh from the walls of an agricultural college may be interesting. First, however, it is necessary to understand the relation of science to agriculture. Farming is an art—the earliest art practiced by man. It will always be an art. Science is literally knowledge, but more usually denotes a systematic arrangement of knowledge. Science is the principle, art the practice. "The scientific man will not make a good artisan," said an instructor, "but when the art is learned he can apply the science, and with the two, go ahead of all others." The art is the parent, science the progeny. By science, literally knowledge, the farmer is better able to understand his success or his failure, suggesting on every hand new lines of thought, strengthening his observing power, and giving him breadth of natural phenomena. To the student it offers the same advantage. College only furnishes the start, but a good one. The mere storing of facts is of no value. We want to know what the facts are, and what of their application. Here is where the agricultural colleges come in. Some one has rightly said, that "the agricultural student if he be faithful, will accumulate a vast amount of information of stearling value for use on the farm, but he cannot, and does not, expect to graduate a perfect master of his art. And why sneer at agricultural colleges for that?

In the past our agricultural colleges have very generally lacked the confidence of the farmers of the state in which they are located. This prejudice is fast wearing away, and some states are nearly free from this slavery. They are proving that the best course of training for a farmer's son is one that gives thorough and practical training in (1.) agriculture, theoretical and practical—every student is required to do a certain amount of work. (2. Botany, including horticulture, market gardening, arboriculture, study of insects injurious and beneficial, etc. (3.) Chemistry; its application to agriculture and the industries. Practical work in the laboratory. Geology and mineralogy, so far as relating to the composition of soils, mineral constituents, etc. (4.) Animal life—Zoology, human physiology and anatomy, veterinary science, etc. (5.) Mathematics and physics, including practical work in surveying, road making, draining and laying of tiles; meteorology in relation of climate to crops, etc. (6.) A training in English and modern languages.

Such is a course laid out and followed at one of our leading agricultural colleges. For the stock raiser is found in this course, aside from the raising of sustenance for his animals, a thorough training in the history, development, and characteristics of the different breeds, as well as their breeding and care. Comparative anatomy of domestic animals and veterinary science occupy his attention six months of senior year. He is not obliged to depend wholly on class room lectures, but he has the advantage of listening to lectures upon the different breeds and their management, by men who actively engage in handling them. Still better, in the college barn can be found specimens of the breeds best suited for and generally found in the state. Here he can observe, and if he chooses, take a hand in their management. During the college course an opportunity was given to all who desired to assist in the underdraining of a tract of land; each member of the freshmen class was obliged to keep the farm acounts during the year; a corn house was built, and sophomores were asked to lend a hand in the planning and raising; a vineyard was to be pruned, and the juniors had a chance; some animals were to be recorded, and the seniors were asked to assist. During the winter of senior year a course in dairying was given for observation of the practical side of a subject at a creamery but one-fourth of a mile distant, and in excursions to prominent dairy farms in the vicinity, as well as lectures from men in the business.

Who can doubt the efficiency of such a training, and why is it that so many farmers are slow in seeing the value of our agricultural colleges? To them the grange and farmers' clubs, our experiment stations might be made what the college is to their sons. Education of this nature will give their sons a better appreciation of home and make them useful and influential citizens.

Northwestern Agriculturist: The problem of which breed is best for certain localties is being worked out, and if it were not for the self-interest of breeders and their consequent disposition to put the best qualities of their stock foremost, concealing defects, the public would know more about the adaptation of certain breeds to certain conditions of climate and soil. Only hardy breeds, that can withstand severe cold, are adapted to the Northwest, but which are the hardiest, is the question not yet settled. Perhaps the experiment stations will help to solve the problem.

That deep ditch in front of the Red River Elevator, while it is a splendid thing for the fifth ward should be covered, in front of business places to prevent the occurrence of such accidents as occurred on Saturday night last. Mr. Rattray, having business with Mr. Smith, drove across the bridge in front of the elevator and went into the elevator leaving the team in charge of two men who were with him. When he came out one of the men in attempting to turn around backed the whole outfit into the ditch where he landed beneath the team. Mr. Smith had great difficulty in rescuing the man from his perilous position but succeeded in doing so however. He justly thinks the big ditch needs a cover there.

Seed Wheat.

One of the first measures to receive attention from our representatives should be to make arrangments to procure seed wheat for all who, having lost their crops by the blight will be unable to obtain seed without outside help. The hail sufferers obtained help from the state once and this calamity is far greater, and more wide spread than that making the need far more urgent. It has been suggested that the county board, in each county where help will be needed, appoint some one whose duty it shall be to receive applications and attend to taking security for the state. This security could be by chattel mortgage upon the crop. While the state would have to take her chances on the coming crop the probability of any great losses are small—these certanly would in no wise cripple her in the slightest and the amount of good done would be incalculable. We believe it is the duty the state owes the settlers up here and that but very little opposition would be met. The matter should be attended to at once before all of the wheat fit for seed shall have been sold out of the country; also to give ample time for the arrangments of all details. Each county board, at its first meeting should attend to the matter and arrange for it; should also see that its influence is brought to bear upon the legislature in the best manner practicable.

Thanksgiving.

Prof. Casey, with his amiable wife gave thanks in the city. If anyone has cause to be thankful Prof. has.

Prof. Elliot, our handsome and accomplished superintendant gave thanks that there were but 640 third party voters and not enough dems to make much difference.

John McLean gave thanks that the new road has reached his promised land—Fosston.

Postmaster McKinnon gave thanks because Wight has not received the un-licked stamps as yet.

Judge Christianson gave thanks because the arm of his enemey was shortened that he could not down him in the good fight.

Harry Falk gave thanks because his prophecy had proved true and he the only winner in that store.

Sheriff Paulsrud gave thanks for 371 on the right side.

The farmer gave thanks for the prospects of better crops and prices next year.

The merchant gave thanks that trade had kept up so well, that collections were better than they had feared they would be and we all gave thanks for the splendid weather that makes this country the Italy of America.

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of two hundred and eleven dollars and sixty cents, ($211.60,) principal and interest, due and which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by Emeline Henlon, a widow, to Smith W. Fisk, bearing date the twelfth day of March A. D. 1887, and duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the eighteenth day of March A. D. 1887, at 11 o'clock and twenty-five minutes a. m., in book "29" of mortgages on pages 348 and 349, said mortgage was made to secure the payment of a promissory note of even date therewith, for the sum of two hundred dollars ($200 00,) payable on or before one year from the date thereof, made by said Emeline Henlon, payable to said Smith W. Fisk or order and delivered by said mortgagor to said mortgagee at the date thereof, and whereas, the power of sale in said mortgage contained has become operative, and no action or proceedings at law or otherwise has been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, and the premises described in and covered by said mortgage, viz: Lots ten (10,) twelve (12) and fourteen (14,) in block three (3,) in Grand Forks East, according to the recorded plat thereof on file, and of record in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for said County of Polk and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances, said premises being situate in said County of Polk, will be sold at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest and ten dollars attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the costs and disbursements allowed by law, which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said County of Polk, at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said county and state, on the first day of February A. D. 1889, at 10 o'clock a. m., of that day, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Our Congressman.

Battle Lake Review.

With all the false reports, campaign lies, charges of corruption and dishonesty, and all that could be said to injure a man's charactor and bring him into discredit and disrepute among the voters of this district, Hon. S. G. Comstock was elected to congress by nearly 10,000 majority over his democratic competitor, Chas. Canning. The result ought to be a good lesson to the democratic party, or that portion of it which is always ready to conduct a campaign by dirt slinging. The people of this district look more to the material in the candidate than what is contained in paid editorials. They had only to make comparisons between the candidates to tell them which way to vote. Mr. Comstock is in the prime of life, a thorough worker and a devoted friend. With these characteristice the people know he would serve the Fifth District of Minnesota in congress much better than a man without legislative experience, and with nothing to recommend him save the bare fact that he is an honest man. Mr. Comstock is also an honest man. No one was ever more so, and in addition to this he is in every sense capable of filling the high position which the people have chosen him to fill. Mr. Comstock is a man of the people, and we know that any of his constituents will receive recognition from him at any time, and nothing would give him greater pleasure than to do them a kindness. That is the disposition of our congressman elect. From personal acquaintance, we know that the Fifth district will never regret having sent Hon. S. G. Comstock to Congress.

Important to Lumbermen, and Others Employing Men in Camps.

I am instructed to ask your immediate attention to the necessity of knowing that the men you employ this winter are thoroughly protected by vaccination against small pox. This disease is again prevailing in places adjacent to the lines of travel both in Canada and the United States. It was brought directly through the Canadian quarantine to a township in this state last August, and resulted in eight cases and three deaths. To avoid the terrible experience of a few years ago, vaccination is the sure safeguard. It is as much for the benefit of the men as for yourselves and the people at large. To be safe, therefore, re-vaccinate every one who has not had a successful vaccination within the last five years, and can show a good scar as evidence thereof.

Your foremen should keep a list of the men, in this respect, and should be on their guard against any eruptive disease appearing among them. Instruct them to isolate any one suspicious symptoms, with their clothing and bedding, till a medical opinion, or sufficient time shall develop their true character. I will advise any one of them, promptly, who will write me for the puryose, and will be obliged for the earliest information of anything suspicious, that we may give assistance where needed.

Will you please acknowledge receipt of this circular and give your co-operation to the plan here suggested?

Address, Respectfully yours,

Marshall County Leader: The Hon. W. D. Washburn is the coming man for U. S. senator. Only the objection so far has been raised against him, to-wit: That he is a railway king and a miller As to the first, Mr. Washburn is in no proper sense a "railway king." Through him, indeed, did the people of this state and Dakota find a way out of paying enormous tribute to the city of Chicago and her trunk lines of railway; for he built the "Soo" which has done more to give our farmers an open market to the seaboard than all the interstate laws which could have been enacted. He also built the Minneapolis and Pacific which paralled Jim Hill's road to this valley. As to his being a member of the miller's ring, we have this to say: No one in his senses will deny for a moment that the large mills of Minneapolis have been a great boon to the entire northwest. They have added to the wheat growers' income enormously, in spite of the fact that at times, the millers have conspired to force down prices.

THE 'FRISCO CHINAMAN.

The Open-Air Cobbler, Sugar-Cane Vender, Pork Butcher, and Pipe Mender.

Few sights in San Francisco prove more attractive to the eastern tourist sojourning in our city than the phases of life in Chinatown, says The San Francisco Chronicle.

The first object of interest is that most important of Mongolian tradesmen, the butcher. The staff of life in Chinatown is pork, and everywhere the venders of the indispensable article of food display their goods. The pork butcher readily wins the admiration of the observant tourist. The dispenser of varnished hog and all the estates and appurtenances of the pig family, from sausage to trichinæ, is generally a sleek, industrious-looking cooly. Coming here with a bogus certificate, purchased at Hong Kong for $75, he manages, by the manful perjury of a score or two of first cousins, to effect a landing. Six months' work as a scavenger supplies him with the money to buy a couple of diseased hogs in Chinatown and start a domestic sausage factory.

One success usually follows another. The pink-eye, an epidemic of the glanders, or hog cholera, puts him on the high road to affluence, and if he begins business early in spring he is in high feather as boss of a thriving pork factory when the winter crop of tourists comes in. The visitor from the east has no time to give the prosperous pork vender more than a superficial investigation, and, though he sees little on the outside of the counter that increase his appetite, he goes away without being positively disgusted. The varnished hog looks rather indigestible, the strings of porcine giblets and entrails have anything but a savory appearance, whose other parts are hidden in the dark storeroom behind the shop, seems scarcely fit for human food.

The tourist remembers, however, that all these joints and fragments of the hog are intended to nourish immigrants who must live on 10 cents a day. He therefore proceeds on his round of inspection rather pleased with his first study, and satisfied that if the Chinese pork butcher is not exactly picturesque he is at least highly useful in the community.

The Mongolian cobbler, mending the shoes of a reduced mandarin who scrapes chins at 5 cents a week in an adjacent barbar-shop, is sure to enchain the attention of the eastern tourist. The cobbler cultivates an intellectual appearance by straddling the bridge of his nose with a pair of large spectacles. It is recorded in Chinese history that once upon a time a cross-eyed cobbler who mended the noble shoes of Confucius had red pepper thrown in his eyes by his hot-tempered spouse, and would have been unable to see straight for a month after but that his learned patron lent him a pair of spectacles, which not only made him see perfectly at once, but also took the squint out of his optics. The sequel of the happy cure was that the cobbler's wife, deceived by the miracle wrought in his eyes, refused to believe that he was her husband, and permitted him to pass the remainder of his life in delightful single-blessedness. Since then every Chinese cobbler from San Francisco to Shanghai wears spectacles to protect him from red-pepper, strabismus, and bad wives.

The patient labor of the Mongolian peddler commends itself to the eastern tourist, who does not know that the sly wax-end manipulator is really the watchful guardian of a tan game half way up the block. The vigilance of the police and the stringent laws against gambling makes it necessary to have a cautious outpost established to give warning to the gamblers when the officers are in sight. The quiet-looking cobbler pegging away at his trade is a desirable sentinel, and wherever one of his trade is seen hammering pegs into Mongolian slippers it is safe to bet that a tan game or an opium den is not far off. The Chinese cobbler is also an encyclopedia and an unbound directory to Chinatown. Every pig-tailed immigrant who wanders as far as the cobbler's stand stops to get points as to the location of the royal Chinese theater, the chief joss-house, and most popular opium den. He is a drummer for several of the aristocratic restaurants in Murderer's alley, and whenever he patches up the shoe of a visiting mandarin from Halfmoon bay or Tomales invariably pastes one of the restaurant cards on the lining of the Celestial brogans.

After putting in half a day in admiration of the accomplishments of the Mongolian cobbler the diligent tourist takes in the vender of sugar-canes, whom he first mistakes as a peddler of fishing poles. This diligent tradesman also comes in for a goodly share of the tourist's interest. Sugar-cane selling is not regarded as a legitimate industry capable of supporting an ambitious man in Chinatown, and is generally adopted by some highbinder whose usefulness has been impaired by inflammatory rheumatism contracted in jail, or a bullet through the lungs. Pending his complete recovery the diligent Mongolian pirate sells sugar-cane at rates that effectually shut out white competition. A pole as long as the mast of a coasting schooner can be bought for 5 cents, or even lower, if the Mongolian pirates that watch the wharves can only get a reasonably dark night after a cargo is unloaded. When the moon is full and the watchmen on the city front have been shaken up by their superiors the sugar-cane market rises so that none but the wealthiest class of rag-pickers and chicken-thieves can afford to gorge themselves on the saccharine pulp. The more aristocratic classes of Chinese, such as pawnbrokers, barbers, and fish-peddlers, do not patronize the sugar-cane merchant extensively, preferring to top off a banquet with stewed birds'-nests, flapjacks of lily powder, rats' liver brochette, or the fins of a juvenile shark fried to a beautiful brown crisp in axle grease. The delightful tourist, if the market is at its condition, invests in some of the toothsome poles, and, after converting his internal economy into a lumber yard, goes on his round of pleasure full of enthusiasm and unrefined sugar.

He next takes in the fish market, and is much impressed by the simple manners and open placid countenance of the shrimp peddler, who has just come in from Hunter's point to dispose of his morning's catch. Shrimps are a great curiosity to the tourists from the middle or western states, especially as he thinks they are caught with a hook and line. Everyone of the strangers from the Atlantic states is not sufficiently versed in piscatoral arts to know that the shrimp is wooed with a net from his sandy retreats along the odoriferous shores of Butchertown bay. The amount of information on the subject of shrimps and fishing generally which the inquisitive tourist gets in Chinatown will never give him brain fever. Every white man who goes into the Chinatown fish market dressed like a person of influence, and bent upon the acquisition of knowledge, is looked upon as a dangerous spy, who has a dozen writs and subpœnas in his pocket. The cooly fisherman lives in open violation of the laws of the land with regard to the sizes of nets, the close season, and other provisions for the preservation of fish. He sweeps the bay ceaselessly with his mosquito bars and catches everything that comes his way, from a shrimp to a man-eating shark. He never casts back anything into the water because of its youth or immaturity, and is therefore pursued by the fish commissioner's deputies as a foe to the fishing industry. The tourist who drops into the market with a note of interrogation in his eye is therefore put down by the whole Chinese population of the place as an officious minion of the fish commissioners, and recieved with ominous silence and scowls. After a vain endeavor to elicit some information in pigeon English to tourist departs, convinced that while the chinese fisherman is a very industrious individual he is also lacking in the sociable characteristics of other classes of his countrymen, like the cobbler and the pork-butcher.

As he strolls toward his hotel for lunch the tourist stops to observe a Mongolian, with a red button in his alpaca cap, drilling holes in some little hemispheres that look like ink-bottles. This personage proves to be deaf and dumb, as far as appearances go. He does not even lift his eyes from his work when questioned as to what he is doing, and the tourist finally wearies of his efforts to extract an answer, and goes home pondering over the sight of Chinatown and the diligence of the deaf-mute vender of Mongolian ink-bottles. The supposed mute is in reality the wily individual who keeps in repair all the opium pipes needed on the block, who directs victims of the terrible habit to convenient dens, supplies young smokers with the deadly drug, and keeps a watchful eye after the police lest they organize a raid on the establishments of his patrons. He is far from deaf or dumb, as the tourist imagined, for that individual has not turned the corner before the wily Mongolian lifted his eyes from his work and remarked to a pig-tailed pard: "Da yank-kay tazur teo hai-o-lay shun pooton-song moy tsz," which being interpreted, means: "Here's another foreign devil come around from the newspapers to burn us up again. May the cobblestones trip him up and break his long neck."

Better Than Money.

"My dear," said a Mission street woman to her husband, "I need $17 for a new sacque."

"Then you'll have to need, because I haven't got it to spare."

"I suppose not; you spend so much money in saloons that your family have to go short."

"I don't."

"O, yes you do. Mrs. Russell told me last week that when her husband was out late one night he confessed to her that it was you who led him astray and kept him out having one more."

"She did, did she? Well the next time you have a gossiping match with that old crow you tell her I was at my office when I got a note to come down to the jail and bail her sweet husband out, and that he was locked up for insulting respectable women. I had to rush around two hours to dig up the money, and twenty of it he owes me now for his fine."

"Why, my darling, is that true? I forgive you, dear, and you needn't mind about the $17. It's worth more than that to crow over that Russell woman with her six-bit silk dress, and a bonnet that would be too giddy for a pickle-factory girl."—San Francisco Post.

Remedy for Tired Eyes.

People speak about their eyes being tired, meaning the retina, or seeing portion of the eye, is fatigued, but such is not the case, as the retina hardly ever gets tired. The fatigue is in the inner and outer muscles attached to the eyeball and the muscle of accommodation, which surrounds the lens of the eye. When a near object is to be looked at this muscle relaxes and allows the lens to thicken, increasing its refractive power. The inner and outer muscle are used in covering the eye on the object to be looked at, the inner one being especially used when a near object is looked at. It is in the three muscles mentioned that the fatigue is felt, and relief is secured temporarily by closing the eyes or gazing at far distant objects. The usual indication of strain is a redness of the rim of the eyelid, betokening a congested state of the inner surface, accompanied with some pain. Sometimes this weariness indicates the need of glasses rightly adapted to the person, and in other cases the true remedy is to message the eye and its surroundings as far as may be with the hand wet in cold water.—Herald of Health.

Quieted by a Photographer.

Speaking of pictures, a friend of ours took her four-year-old girl to a photographer. The child couldn't be made to sit still. He of the camera was as suave as could be, and worked every device of gentle persuasion to make the little wriggler sit still. Finally he said to the despairing mother:

"Madam, if you will leave the little dear alone with me a few minutes I think I can succeed."

The mother had scarcely withdrawn when she was summoned back by the triumphant photographer, who exhibited a satisfactory negative. When they reached home the mother asked:

"Nellie, what did the man say to you when I left you alone with him?"

"He said," lisped Nellie, "thit thtill, you damn little rathcal, or I'll shake you!"—Buffalo Express.

Will Stay Down.

"I figure like this," he said, as he sharpened away at the point of his pencil. "I can go to South America and purchase five hundred horses at $12 per head. The moment they are landed here I can sell them for $50 each."

"That would be a big spec."

"You bet, and—and—gosh."

"What is it?"

"I'm busted clear to smash! I'd have to buy five hundred as soon as the horses landed, and where's the money to do it with? That's the way with these infernal monopolies always keep a poor man down!"—Wall Street News.

A CANINE SUMMER RESORT.

Visit to a Peculiar Establishment for a Peculiar Aristocracy.

A dog's boarding house, reached by rail or water, whichever the aristocratic constitution of the canine sang-azure will best endure, says The Boston Advertiser, an hour on the old colony road and forty-five minutes by steamer will take you to the charming seashore town where this abode of dog comfort is to be found. It is a lovely trail to follow, through shaded streets and cross-cut paths overhung by vine-wound trees, the wild grapes tossing defiant clusters almost in the passer's face, up over a long hill by the town hall on the left. A turn of the road to the right and I found myself at the entrance to a shady country yard with a low seat made by nature in the big tree at the right of the path where a brown-eyed girl of 12 swung her feet in unconscious imitation of the summer coquette in her hammock, with a meek-faced, snowy dog lying at her feet. To the inquiry: "Is this a summer-house for dogs?" she dropped lightly to the ground with an affirmative nod, and as her father was away acted as "intelligent guide" through the quarters. Passing around the neat white cottage, with its green blinds, we made our way toward the great barn in the rear escorted by five dogs of various sizes, shapes, and colors, and followed by the angry growls of a sixth, a huge mastiff who was chained securely in the little back porch. In the barn a beautiful hound rushed out of a stall-box as we entered, where the little maiden told us he was accustomed to sleep and stay with the horse who usually stood there and with whom a great intimacy had been established, the horse nosing carefully all about the dog if he was sleeping in his grain box or manger, as often occured. Once the dog was found dozing on the horse's back. A deep pit at the side of the barn had been dug, in which some dozen dogs leaped and bounded against the stout fortress of logs with which the sides are strengthened against their fierce scrambling assaults and their insane desire to burrow out under the barricades. A litter of Gordon setters, just old enough to tumble about, were investigating with curious noses a poor little black puppy, who was so sick that they did not "hope to save him," said the girl. A magnificent retriever who occupied an adjoining and somewhat more exclusive pen viewed our eager faces over the parapet with fine disdain. He rejoiced under the name of Running Chesapeake and belonged to a New York gentleman. Tempter was the name of a black and white pointer, and a black, shaggy dog-beauty claimed as his brother a brown-spotted pointer called Brown Gown.

Standing upon the top of a tidy little dog-house stood a slender greyhound, belonging to an English lady who was traveling in the west, and a dear little ball of white silk named Flurry was a regular summer boarder, coming season after season to be cared for while her mistress, a prominent actress goes for her summer rest to a favorite resort, which, unfortunately, does not agree with Flurry, as she suffers from hay-fever.

The dogs receive the kindest of care, are carefully fed, exercised, washed and combed, and tended with faithfulness which insures their frequent return, even at the comfortable compensation charged. The terms vary, of course, according to the case required. Some of the ordinary breeds, or rather no breeds being simply allowed to run, with their meals set out at regular times, while others must be cuddled like babbies and sleep in the house, and others still are sent there to be cured of mange and less plebeian skin diseases. One lady who goes to Flordia yearly sends her Italian grayhound, Beauty, here until her return, it is so sensitive to malaria. Professional people are the best patrons.

Why He Howled.

Look at that Maine individual over there in the red flannel shirt which is not even on speaking terms with soap. You might not think from a casual observation that he has any peculiarities whatever, but the other day he came down with a terrible toothache—an ache that reared and kicked and "bucked" all within thirty seconds, till this world ceased to have any attractions for the man who was entertaining it. Well, he just couldn't stand it any longer, and started post haste for a dentist in a neighboring town.

The proprietor of a hardware store in close proximity to this dentist was standing in the door of his store, that afternoon when he heard a most terrible and ear-splitting shriek proceeding from the office of the man of tooth. He had become accustomed to moans and subdued exclamations from that quarter, but never had he heard such bellowings as now pierced the air. His curiosity was so thoroughly aroused that a little later on he walked into the dentist's office and said: "Whom have you been butchering over here? I never heard such a yell in all my life."

"Oh," replied the extractor of molars," that was old John Tarbox, from T——. He had a tooth out."

"He had a tooth out!" replied the visitor, "well I should say so, and it must have come mighty hard to fetch such a roar as that."

"Oh, dear, no," said the dentist, "he didn't make that noise when I pulled the tooth. It was afterward."

"Afterward?"

"Why, yes," was the reply, "the tooth came easily enough. The time he fetched that cry of agony was when I charged him 50 cents for doing the job!"—Lewiston Journal.

A Little Mistake.

Some of the nuts which little folks have to crack, in getting at the kernel of language-meanings, are tough indeed. Little Annie had been asked to take a dish of strawberries and cream to grandma's room.

"Did she like them?" asked her mother, when the little maid appeared again.

"I don't know," was the serious answer.

"Didn't she say anything when she tasted them?"

"Yes'm; something about clothes."

"Why, what could it be? Have you forgotten?"

"Oh, no! She tasted, and then she said, 'Oh, neckties and Ann's mohair?', I don't know what she meant."

Neither did mamma, and so she posted up to grandma's room herself.

"Do you remember just what exclamation you made when you began to eat your fruit?" she asked the old lady.

"No, I'm sure I can't. Oh, yes, I can! I said, 'Nectar and amborsia!'"

"WHAT'S KILLING US?"

The Wonders Which the Microscope Reveals.

One of the leading scientific publications states that many people are now using the microscope to discover the real cause of disease in the system, and to detect adulterations of food and medicines.

This wonderful instrument has saved many a life. A microscopical test shows, for instance, the presence of albumen, or the life of the blood, in certain derangements of the kidneys, but medicine does not tell us how far advanced the derangement is, or whether it shall prove fatal.

The microscope, however, gives us this knowledge.

Bright's disease, which so many people dread, was not fully known until the microscope revealed its characteristics. It greatly aids the physician, skilled in its use, in determining how far disease has advanced; and gives a fuller idea of the true structure of the kidney.

A noted German scholar recently discovered that by the aid of the microscope the physician can tell if there is a tumor forming in the system, and if certain appearance are seen in the fluids passed, it is proof positive that the tumor is to be a malignant one.

If any derangement of the kidneys is detected by the microscope, the physician looks for the developement of almost any disease the system is heir to, and any indication of Bright's disease, which has no symptoms of its own, and cannot be fully recognized except by the microscope, he looks upon with alarm.

This disease has existed for more than 2,000 years. It is only until recently that the microscope has revealed to us its universal prevalence and fatal character. Persons who formerly died of what was called general debility, nervous breakdown, dropsy, paralysis, heart-disease, rheumatism, apoplexy, etc., are now known to have really died of kidney disease, because had there been no disorder of the kidneys, the chances are that the effects from which they died would never have existed.

As the world becomes better acquainted with the importance of the kidneys in the human economy by the aid of the microscope, there is greater alarm spread through the communities concerning it, and this accounts for the erroneous belief that it is on the increase.

As yet neither homeopathist nor allopathist is prepared with a cure for deranged kidneys, but the world has long since recognized, and many medical gentlemen also recognize and prescribe Warner's safe cure for these derangements, and admit that it is the only specific for the common and advanced forms of kidney disorders.

Formerly the true cause of death was discovered only after death. Today the microscope shows us, in the water we pass, the dangerous condition of any organ in the body, thus enabling us to treat it promptly and escape premature death.

As the microscope in the hands of laymen has revealed many diseases that the medical men were not aware of, so that preparation, like many other discoveries in medicine and science, was found out by laymen; outside the medical code; consequently it comes very hard for medical men to indorse and prescribe it. Nevertheless, Warner's safe cure continues to grow in popularity and the evidences of its effectiveness are seen on every hand.

Some persons claim that the proprietors should give the medical profession the formula of this remedy, if it is such a "God-send to humanity," and let the physicians and public judge whether or not it be so recognized.

We, however, do not blame them for not publishing the formula, even to get the recognition of the medical profession. The standing of the men who manufacture this great remedy is equal to that of the majority of physicians, and the reason that some doctors give for not adopting and prescribing it—viz.: that they do not know what its ingredients are—is absurd.

Mr. Warner's statement—that many of the ingredients are expensive, and that the desire of the unscrupulous dealer or prescriber to realize a large profit, from its manufacture by using cheap and injurious substances for those ingredients would jeopardize its quality and reputation; and that Warner's safe cure cannot be made in small quantities on account of the expensive apparatus necessary in compounding these ingredients—seems to to be a reasonable and sufficient one.

The universal testimony of our friends and neighbors, and the indisputable evidence that it, and it alone, has complete mastery over all diseases of the kidneys, is sufficient explanation, and conclusive proof that it is, perhaps, the most beneficient discovery known to scientific medicine since the microscope revealed to us the all-important nature of the organs it is designed to reach and benefit.

It is now known definitely that the vessel wrecked near Waterford, Ireland, was the American ship Alfred O. Snow, Capt. Henry, which left San Francisco Aug. 31 for Liverpool. The ship was lost in Herrylock bay off Arthurstown at the entrance to Waterford harbor. There is no doubt that every member of the crew perished.

ST. JACOBS OIL.

WHAT IT HAS DONE.

Relief.—In any climate at any season one or two applications of St. Jacobs Oil relieves; often cures permanently. This is the average experience in ten years.

Cures.—The contents of a bottle have cured thousands of extreme chronic cases. Used according to directions there is a cure in every bottle.

The Testimony.—Thousands of testimonials substantiate the above statements in the cure of all kinds of painful ailments.

The Proof.—To make sure of this showing, answers to inquiries concerning the permanency of the cures resulted as follows: That from date of healing to date of response every cure has remained permanent without recurrence of pain.

Its Supremacy.—The twenty million bottles sold can be justly rated as so many cures; in almost every case a permanent cure. Its price is the surety of every bottle being the same, every bottle being a cure and the poor are protected.

An ugly complexion made Nellie a fright
Her face was all pimply and red,
Though her features were good, and her blue eyes were bright,
"What a plain girl is Nellie!" they said

But now, as by magic, plain Nellie has grown
As fair as an artist's bright dream;
Her face is as sweet as a flower new-blown,
Her cheeks are like peaches and cream.

As Nellie walks out in the fair morning,
Her beauty attracts every eye.
And as for the people who called her a fright,
"Why, Nellie is handsome;" they cry.

And the reason of the change is that Nellie took Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, which regulated her liver, cleared her complexion, made her blood pure, her breath sweet, her face fair and rosy, and removed the defects that had obscured her beauty. Sold by druggists.

How to Select a Wife.

Good health, good morals, good sense and good temper, are the four essentials for a good wife. These are the indispensables. After them comes the minor advantages of good looks, accomplishments, family position, etc. With the first four, married life will be comfortable and happy. Lacking either, it will be in more or less degree a failure. Upon good health depends largely good temper and good looks, and to some extent good sense also, as the best mind must be affected more or less by the weaknesses and whims attendant on frail health. Young man, if your wife is falling into a state of invalidism, first of all things try to restore her health. If she is troubled with debilitating female weaknesses, buy Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It will cure her.

Helpless 40 Days

The great agony caused by rheumatism is indescribable, and the gratitude of those who take Hood's Sarsaparilla and are cured is often beyond expression. The following is from a well-known Wisconsin farmer, and is endorsed by the editors of the Neillsville, Wis., Times as entirely true:

"For 25 years I have suffered with sciatic rheumatism. Last November I was taken worse than ever, and was unable to get out of the house. I was almost helpless for forty days, suffering great agony all the time. In December I commenced taking Hood's Sarsaparilla. After the second bottle I was able to be out and around and attend to business. I took five bottles, and am now so free from rheumatism that only occasionally I feel it slightly on a sudden change of weather. I have great confidence in Hood's Sarsaparilla." THE SKEIN WE WIND.

If you and I to-day
Should stop, and lay
Our life work down, and let our hands fall where they will—
Fall down to lie quite still;
And if some other hand should come and stoop to find
The threads we carried so that it could wind,
Beginning where we stopped; if it should to keep
Our life-work going, seek
To carry on the good design
Distinctively made yours or mine,
What would it find? * * *
If love should come,
Stooping above, when we are done,
To find bright threads
That we have held, that it may spin them longer, find but shreds
That break when touched, how cold.
Sad, shivering, portionless, the hands will hold
The broken strands, and know
Fresh cause for woe.

HOW CAME IT THERE.

BY MARGERY DEANE.

But one thing marred the home Kate and I made for ourselves in Belleville, just after we were married, and that one thing marred it very little in the first years. It was a trifle—merely that the next house was reputed haunted, and being empty presented rather a desolate appearance. Neither Kate or I took much stock in the villagetales of ghosts who dwelt there; yet we often wished for neighbors and would have been glad for some life at the blinded windows.

The two houses stood a little back from the village street in pleasant grounds, and were not a hundred feet apart. The haunted house was large and handsome. The place was in the care of a trusty gardener, who kept the keys, entering at intervals the rear door to see that the elements were kept out. He cared for the grounds and cultivated for himself the large garden behind it.

Kate had more than once confided to me that the place "gave her the creeps," and I had comforted her by the assurance that since the house showed no decay and the grounds were well kept up no neighbors were vastly better than bad ones.

The house had been vacated many years before we came to Belleville. The story ran that a stranger bought it of its builder for a summer residence. Except that this stranger "looked like a lord," and was very austere in manner, nobody could describe him, for nobody could have the courage to approach him. His young wife was a very beautiful Polish woman, who spoke not a word of English. The two usually talked in French, and as they walked down the village street, conversed so earnestly together as to seem unconscious of any one whom they met or passed. Often there were tears in the great, black eyes of the lovely Pole, and frequently she had been seen to burst into a fit of weeping while sitting on her veranda and to go quickly into the house, her handkerchief pressed against her face.

I can well understand the effect of this mysterious sorrow upon certain people in the village, whose neighbor's joys and woes are to them even greater than their own. Unfortunately for Belleville gossips, neither the man servant nor the maid servant who came with this couple could speak a word of English. This indeed was cruel.

It was said by a workingman who made some repairs to the furniture which had been brought in huge, foreign-looking cases, that such furnishing had never been seen in Belleville; that there were rooms whose walls were hung with silk damask with huge flowers wrought upon it, and that the bed hangings were of the same rich stuff. The furniture new, all foreign and carved. While people yet wondered about the interior, it was suddenly stripped of all its adornment, and the big cases went off. The gentleman and servants left town at midnight, but it has been asserted that the beautiful Polish lady never was known to go away. She certainly was not left in the house, for half the villagers trooped through it to satisfy their curiosity, and then it was shut up and the gardener kept the keys.

How the story started that the house was haunted I do not know. Possibly had I known all this, I might have hesitated a little before buying our home, for Kate is a bit nervous, and being a physician I had to leave her often at night. Thoughtless persons told her tales of the haunted house, only one of which I recall, and that said that the Polish lady had been seen at night to pass in and out of the locked, closed door, it offering no resistance to her.

It was late one night when our door-bell rang and I answered it myself. A strange gentleman—I knew every man by sight in the village—asked me to come and see a very sick lady. I begged him to enter and sit down, while I made preparations to accompany him, during which I asked:—

"Where is the patient?"

"She is in the next house," he replied.

"Surely, not in the next house," I answered. "That is empty. No one lives there!"

"She is in the next house, sir."

"I beg your pardon. I did not know that anyone had moved in."

Kate, overhearing us, entered the room and remarked a little excitedly. "There is certainly no one next door. The house is wholly unfurnished."

"Look!" said the stranger, drawing aside the curtain, and pointing to the second story, where in the middle of the house were two brilliantly lighted windows.

Kate was pale. It did not seem possible that even a footstep on the gravel path could be have fallen unheeded by her; that even a lamp could have been conveyed into the house and she not know it.

The stranger was tall, fine-looking, and gave the impression of tremendous reserve force. His manner was genial and exceedingly courteous, but be spoke as one accustomed to command, and with few words. Telling Kate that it was, undoubtedly, the owner of the place just arrived, and that I must obey a professional call, I left her with her little womanly fears and all her womanly curiosity creating quite a turmoil within her.

We passed out of my gate and into that of the next enclosure. The stranger led the way up the steps and easily opened the door. He had the manner of a man entering his own house. The hall and all the lower rooms were empty and desolate. A light streamed from a door of the upper room, flooding the staircase, up which I followed my guide, who, without a word led me into the lighted apartment. It was midwinter and the lower part of the house had felt chill and damp; here, however, was an agreeable warmth, and the apartment struck me as one of great luxury and comfort, and of a character decidedly original and foreign. On my way to the bed, I noticed that the walls were hung with a large flowered damask, very rich in texture, but a little faded. The bed curtains were of the same, and all the furniture was carved in high relief

On the bed lay a very beautiful woman. Her face was a perfect oval, her eyes were large and black, and full of inexpressible sadness. She was in great pain, but very beautiful even in agony. In response to my first question she spoke in a language strange to me.

"Madame will speak French," suggested the gentleman, asking with a glance if I did also, and I immediately began to question her in that language.

I soon ascertained the trouble and felt there was little or no chance of her surviving long. I took out my prescription book, noted the case, the disease, and its stage, etc., at the top of the leaf. I wrote the prescription below and tore it off, placing it upon the end of the mantel, with orders to administer the remedy every hour until morning, when I would return.

My inclination was to offer neighborly assistance, but the gentleman's manner, polite in the extreme, showed me very plainly that nothing more was expected of me, and I was ushered out of the room, down the stairs and out of the door by my new neighbor, who so noisily closed the door behind me that Kate heard it and was ready to greet me as I entered my own. With wide eyes she listened to my description of apartment and patient, and went to sleep asking the puzzling question, "How could they have moved in, and I not have heard them?"

In the morning after my coffee, I went again to my mysterious patient. I had little hope of finding her alive and none at all of finding her better. I noticed a light snow lay unbroken upon the steps as I went up them, and yet it had not snowed for two days. I attempted to enter without knocking, but on turning the knob I found the door fastened. I knocked at first gently, then louder, and at last with my fist on the central panel so noisily as to bring the old gardener from his hens in the rear. He looked at me as if my senses had flown, and asked:—

"Please sir, an' wot are you doing?"

"I want to get in."

"And wot ever do you want to get in for," exclaimed the gardener.

"I want to see the sick lady, if she is still alive."

"The sick lady! But there's no sick lady, nor never a soul in the house, an' hasn't been these 10 years."

"You are mistaken. I was here last night. I must go in again. I saw the gentleman and lady myself. It is the owner come back, I fancy."

The gardener smiled sadly, and as if to humor me, took from his pocket a key.

"It is the key of that door," he said, "and the only key to that door, and never myself for years have I put it in that lock, comin' and goin' as I do by the kitchen; but to show you that the house is empty, I will open it and you shall go in."

He cleared the keyhole of an accumulation of dust and bits of dried leaves, looking significantly at me, and still more so as the door creaked and turned stiffly on its hinges, disclosing as it opened, loose pieces of paper, and little dirt heaps that laid against it on the inside. The once polished floor and staircase was covered with a coating of dust which surely could not have been disturbed for many a month. I began to feel dazed. All was empty and desolate below, as on the night before. I bounded up the stairs feeling the cobwebs brush across my face. The door of the sick woman's apartment was open. I took one step across its threshhold—

It was cold, damp and empty! It was devoid of any movable thing; a few nails showed where once had been hangings on the walls, and from these hung festoons of cobwebs, heavy with the dust of years. I staggered as one struck with blindness, seeing not what he knows to be there. I was as one who realizes his reason to be leaving him; the old gardener stood motionless before me, pale, and as if stricken with a nameless fear. Suddenly I rallied and called out: "Look! look! on the mantel!—at the end—you will find it there—my prescription! and it fits to this," taking my note book from my pocket.

And he looked and it was there.

I wrote that prescription for the Polish woman, December 17, 1884.

I believe the good gardener has intimated that the doctor is not quite right in his head, and that once he saw him clean out of it. Kate's nerves prevented our talking together very much of this one mystery in our lives. Toward spring it occurred to me to buy the property, move the house away and add the grounds to our own. Inquiries made in Europe where the owner was supposed to be, resulted in my receiving the following letter:—

Dear Sir:—The former owner of the property, whom you seek to find, died some years since. It fell to his widow, who, after his death, was again known as before her marriage, La Countess Marie Krasicka. We find that she is no longer living, having died December 17, 1884. The enclosed addresses of her heirs will aid you, and there is little doubt that the American estate can be purchased by you.

Yours very truly,

The house is gone, the grounds are ours. I know I placed that prescription on the mantel. I know that never in the flesh could I have entered that door that night. How came it there?

"There's a big mistake in the school system; it's all wrong," said Dr. Talmage in the course of a recent sermon in the Brooklyn tabernacle. "No child ought to study more than six hours. That's enough for any child; the other hours of daylight should be for recreation. Overstudy by this stuffing machine called school is wrong. I know a child that died under this system while saying her multiplication table."

General O. M. Mitchel.

The most notable lectures on astronomy that Mitchel delivered were given at the Academy of Music, in New York, in 1860, to create a fund for the erection of an observatory in Central Park. The immense audiences were composed of the most cultivated citizens. The final lecture ended with the following remarkable example of eloquence, containing the speaker's ripest generalizations on the subject of astronomy:

"Now my friends, I must close this long course of lectures. We have passed from planet to planet, from sun to sun, from system to system. We have reached beyond the limits of this mighty stellar cluster with which we are allied. We have found other island universes, sweeping through space. The grand unfinished problem still remains. Whence, whence this magnificent architecture, whose architraves rise in splendor before us in every direction? Is it all the work of chance? Who shall reveal to us the true cosmogony of the universe by which we are surrounded? Is it the work of an omnipotent architect? If so, who is this august being? Go with me to-night in imagination, and stand with old Paul, the great apostle, upon Mars Hill, and there look around you as he did. Here rises that magnificent building, the Parthenon, sacred to Minerva, the goddess of wisdom. There towers her colossal statue, rising in its majesty above the city of which she was the guardian, the first object to catch the rays of the rising, the last to be kissed by the rays of the setting sun. There are the temples of all the gods; and there are the shrines of every divinity. And yet I tell you these gods and these divinities, though created under the inspiring fire of poetic fancy and Greek imagination, never reared this stupendous structure by which we are surrounded. The Olympic Jove never built these heavens. The wisdom of Minerva never organized these magnificent systems. I say with Saint Paul; 'Oh, Athenians! in all things I find you too superstitious; for in passing your streets I find an altar inscribed "To the unknown God"—Him whom ye ignorantly worship. And this is the God I declare unto you—the God that made heaven and earth, who dwells not in temples made with hands.'

"No, here is the temple of our Divinity. Around us and above us rise sun and system, cluster and universe. And I doubt not that in every region of this vast empire of God hymns of praise and anthems of glory are rising and reverberating from sun to sun, and from system to system, heard by Omnipotence alone across immensity and through eternity."

Boys, Don't do it.

A few days ago a young man came in who had started, a year before, in a machine shop and foundry, intending to serve his time of three or more years and become a thorough master of his trade. He had begun with small pay, less than $1 per day, but being apt, quick to learn, comprehend and execute, he had gradually advanced and his pay increased, till he was getting $10 per week and a good line of work. He had just received an offer of $12 per week to quit his place and take an entirely different position; in fact, a fireman's job, and he came in for advice and to talk it over with us. As his case is analogous to many young men who are similarly situated and tempted, and as we hold that the continued supremacy of the United States in machinery and mechanical construction is in the keeping of the young men who are to-day learning their trades, we feel impelled to rise and remark: "Boys, don't do it." Your firm took you on trust; you were not worth to them when you began $1 a week, but with an abiding faith in your abilities and honor, they gave time, tools and patience to get your dormant, untutored mechanical ideas bent in the right direction. You occupied a lathe and spoiled stock, and secured them a loss that even a medium workman would easily have changed into a handsome profit. As you advanced, became shopwise, and could do passable work, they advanced you, went all over the same or similar ground with you again, until you were again worthy of an advance.

And so it goes on; some of you have put in one, some two years, on your trade. If you've been smart, faithful, and done for yourself what you could and ought to have done, and what the firm designed you to do, you can take this or that journeyman's place, if he is absent from the shop for a day or two.

You are worth something to the firm that has made you what you are. Then somebody comes along and offers you $2 per week more than the firm is paying you. Seeing you are active, smart, capable, they wish to acquire (and that is a mild form to apply to it) the benefit of the schooling, the education, the other firm has given you.

Boys, don't do it. You stultify and debase your inborn noble nature when you take it; you disgrace an honorable record, the best heritage you've got or can get, when you entertain seriously such proposals.—Sanitary Engineer.

A Cancer Hospital.

By means of some magnificent gifts of some of New York's millionaires a handsome building has been erected, thoroughly equipped and fitted up for the accommodation and cure of patients suffering from cancers. Seventy-seven invalids in all can be taken care of, and the facilities for the treatment of this terrible affliction are unequaled in this country or any other. At present the hospital will be used solely for female patients, though it is the intention to ultimately extend the advantages of its treatment to the other sex. The staff of physicians comprises some of the most celebrated in New York city, and especially those who are conversant with diseases of the blood. The founding of a cancer hospital is somewhat of a new departure in medical annals, but when the subject was first broached physicians were unanimous in declaring that the benefits that would arise from such an institution would more than realize the expectations of its founders. Cancerous growths require peculiar and expert treatment, and here abundant provision has been made for it.

THE SOLDIER.

His Busy Life in Times of Peace.

From New York Times.

The laws and regulations governing the army are clearly defined and comprehensive and many of them have remained unchanged since the founding of the Government. Like all of Gaul the geographical limits of military jurisdiction are divided into three parts, known as the Military Divisions of the Atlantic, the Missouri, and the Pacific, each commanded by a Major General of the army. These grand division headquarters are at Governor's Island, Chicago and San Francisco, respectively. The army consists of 25 regiments of infantry, 10 of cavalry and 5 of artillery, a battalion of engineers, consisting of 4 companies and a detachment of ordnance. The Ninth and Tenth Regiments of cavalry and the Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Regiments of infantry are colored soldiers.

These regiments are in all respects on the same military footing as all others. The non-commissioned officers are selected and promoted from the ranks of their own regiments, and the commissioned officers are assigned to the regiments as vacancies occur. Each colored regiment has a Chaplain.

A detailed description of the duties of soldiers, even in peace times, would require too much time and space, but a general idea of the daily routine will correct the erroneous impression so generally entertained that a soldier's life is one of idleness. Reveille is sounded at or near sunrise, the exact time varying somewhat at different posts. At the first note the garrison flag is hoisted. All soldiers on duty must turn out in ranks at this and all roll calls. Drill for an hour or more follows soon after at a time fixed by the commanding officer. The ceremony of guard mounting takes place at 9 o'clock; fatigue call comes next in order (the sick call which intervenes not being, of course, a call for duty,) when such men consisting of the old guard and others designated in turn to perform the necessary fatigue and police duty of the post. At 11 o'clock First Sergeant's call is sounded, when these functionaries repair to the adjutant's office for the perfecting of the rolls of the sergeant major, thus enabling him to keep his roster correctly, and also to receive such information and instructions as may be necessary concerning their troops, batteries or companies. Dinner is at noon. At an hour designated by the post commander, afternoon drill call is sounded, when the troops exercise in such manœvers as are prescribed. Dress parade usually takes place just before sunset, and is so timed that retreat is sounded just after the "troop beats off" during that ceremony. The flag is lowered at the last note of retreat. Supper soon follows dress parade. Tattoo roll call is at 9 o'clock and taps or lights out a half an hour later. While attendance at religious ceremonies is not compulsory in the army, many of the men attend divine service at those posts, of which there are thirty-four, that have chaplains, and more observance is given to the day than was the case in former years.

Men are detailed for guard duty with such frequency as the strength of the force at the post where they are stationed renders necessary. There are three reliefs of a prescribed number of men, with one Corporal to each relief and one Sergeant of the guard. Two hours on the post and four hours off, during the tour of twenty-four hours, is the unvarying routine. Each sentinel is instructed by the Officer of the Guard, who is a Lieutenant under authority of the Officer of the Day, to take charge of this post and all Government property in view; salute all officers according to rank; in case of fire alarm the guard, and such other orders as are deemed necessary are given. The order is given to the sentry on No. 1 "to turn out the guard for all General officers, the commanding officers the Officer of the day, and for all armed parties." Any breach of discipline while on guard is an aggravation of the offence and it behooves the soldier to have his wits about him and to attend strictly to duty during his tour. Guard duty is, like the reading of the Koran, an endless task.

Our military posts are in many instances isolated communities themselves, and in many respects as different from civilian settlements or villages as well can be imagined. There are post schools, at which enlisted soldiers can, if so disposed, pick up a fair common school education during one term of enlistment. The subject of compulsory education in the army has been exhaustively discussed of late, and so accomplished an officer as Brevet Major General James B. Fry has given it as his opinion that enlisted men should not be compelled against their wills to attend post schools. About ten years ago James A. Garfield and Robert Schenck, while serving on the committee on military affairs in the House of Representatives, prepared a clause in the Revised Statutes, section 1231, which afterward became a law, and which is as follows:

"Schools shall be established at all posts, garrisons, or permanent camps at which the enlisted men may be instructed in the common English branches of education, and especially in the history of the United States; and the Secretary of War may detail such officers and enlisted men as may be necessary to carry out this provision." etc.

School hours for soldiers are from half an hour after retreat until tattoo roll call. The post schools are not at present kept up to the standard of excellence intended by the provisions of the law, and at many posts the letter of the law alone is observed.

The men of the army have various amusements, which, however, vary much at different posts. Amateur theatricals and minstrel performances are of frequent occurrence at some during the winter months. The post and the company libraries are sources of comfort to soldiers, and gymnastic exercises, field sports and athletic games serve to amuse them. Marksmanship may be said to have begun with the advent of the foreign team that came here fifteen years ago. Such development of sharpshooting as followed has rarely been known until now. Marksmen and sharpshooters predominate in the ranks of the army. The practical life of a soldier and the technical studies necessary to a thorough knowledge of his duties are far greater and more exhaustive than is generally understood. The citizen soldier has little idea of these things as a rule, and the civilian, with rare exception, none at all. How many can tell the thickness of ice necessary to bear cavalry, artillery or infantry? How many know of what a soldier's ration consists, and the thousand and one other things as pertinent as these in times of active service?—New York Times.

The Eggs of the Sea Dove.

There is nothing the children enjoy more than their after-dinner talks with "Uncle Cap," as they familiarly term their father's brother, Captain Linn Gordon, U. S. N., retired list. He lives with them apparently to their minds, for the sole purpose of telling them stories. They capture him every evening, and during the hour between dinner and bedtime he is at their mercy. The only way in which he can secure the honorable treatment due a prisoner of war is by relating a tale of adventure, or by presenting them with some of the valuable and generally curious information with which his mind is stored.

On one of these evenings, just as Uncle Cap had seated himself comfortably in his big chair in front of the fire, and the expectant listeners were gathered about him, little Bryce remarked that he found a nest with six eggs in it out in the barn.

"Pooh!" said Uncle Cap; "that's nothing. I found a nest once with a hundred and seventy eggs in it."

"Oh!" exclaimed all the children, with wide-open eyes.

"How many hens laid 'em?" asked Bryce.

"Not a hen," answered Uncle Cap.

"Must have been a funny kind of bird," said little Miss Blue.

"Well, it wasn't exactly a bird either."

"I know—alligator!" shouted Belty—short for Belmont.

"No, not alligator. But I'll tell you all about it, and before I've got through perhaps you will guess. It was many years ago, when I was a middy, and attached to the old Perpoise on the West India station. During the month of May our mess happened to be entirely out of eggs. Of course we had never wanted them so badly, nor thought so much of eggs, as now that we did not have them, and saw no prospect of getting any.

"One bright moonlight night, as we lay at anchor in a little bay close to the shore of an uninhabited island—or key, as they call it down there—I saw from the deck a black object moving on the beach, and asked an old quartermaster, who had made many a cruise in these parts, what he thought it was.

"'That,' said he, 'is a dove, a sea-dove, up to lay her eggs in the sand.'

"I laughed at what I thought was his joke; but he said. 'You may think I am not telling you the truth, but if you go ashore in the morning and follow her tracks up the beach, you'll find her nest, and if you dig in the right part of it you'll find eggs too.'

"I was sent ashore next day with a party to fill water-casks at a natural cistern in the rocks, and while the men were at work I strolled over to where I had seen the black object the night before. There, sure enough, were tracks leading up to the top of the beach, where the sand was hot and dry. Where they ended quite a large space was cleared of the beach grass, and beaten down smooth and hard. Curious to see if there was anything there, I got a spade and began to dig; but though I dug for more than half an hour I discovered nothing but sand."

"How green you must have been, Uncle Cap!" laughed Jackanapes.

"Yes, I was pretty green in those days, that's a fact, and also very red from my exertions in the hot sun just then. But as I was giving the job up in disgust, along came the old quartermaster, who laughed when he saw what I was doing.

"'Let me show you how to find them,' said he. With this he cut a slender stalk of cane and began thrusting it deep into the sand, examining the end every time he withdrew it. At last the end came up all yellow with the yolk of an egg. Digging at that spot, about two feet below the surface I came to a nest as big round as my hat, in which, layer upon layer were 170 of the prettiest eggs I had ever seen. They were the size of large plums, and covered with a glistening white skin so tough that I could not break one by pinching it between my thumb and forefinger.

"That night a party of us went ashore, and by keeping carefully concealed had the pleasure of seeing a great loggerhead turtle—"

"Oh, Uncle Cap—turtle-doves! What a joke!" cried Bryce.

—"Dig a hole in the sand with her fore-flippers, lay her eggs, cover them with sand with her hind-flippers, and then smooth the whole place down by the weight of her body. We came out in plain view while she was laying the eggs, but she paid no attention to us. As soon as she had got all through, however, she started in a hurry for the water. We headed her off, and it took the united strength of three of us to turn her on her back. Then we dug into the nest, and afterward we ate both the tutrtle and her eggs."

"Well," said Jackanapes, "that beats hens all hollow!"—Harper's Young Folks.

Europe's Notable Old Men.

From the London Daily News.

Beginning his eighty-third year, M. Ferdinand de Lesseps can look around and see but few men of anything like equal eminence who are as old as he. The German emporer is 90; Dr. Dollinger is 88; Moltke and Bancroft, the historians, are each 87; Kossuth is 85, and Prof. Owen is 83; but it is not easy to extend the list. Yet it is astonishing to note the large number of living great men who have passed the ordinary limit of human life. Of sovereigns, the pope is 77, and King William of the Netherlands is well on his 71st year. Of statesmen, Mr. Gladstone is 79; Mr. Bright is 76; Prince Bismarck is 72; M. Jules Grevy is 74; M. Leon Say and M. Leroyer are each 71; Lord Selborne is 75 and Lord Granville is 72. Of generals, McMahon is 79; LeBoeuf is 78; and Bazaine and Cialdini are each 76. Of poets, Lord Tennyson is 78, Mr. Browning is 75 and Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes is 78. Of musicians, M. Verdi is 73. Of engineers, Lord Armstrong is 77, and Sir John Hawkshaw is 76. Of painters, Meissonier is 78; and finally, of showmen, Barnum is 77. Perhaps, however, M. Chevreul, who is fairly started upon his one hundred and second year, ought not to be omitted.

The Happy Woman.

I can not understand how a woman who has been accorded that greatest of all gifts from heaven, a happy home life, can desire any career which interferes with it. The result of my observation does not lead me to believe that women who are sheltered with love and protection and appreciation, do long for the plaudits of the world.

A great deal is said and written of the young girl or worshiped wife who neglects kind parents or a devoted husband to pursue a career. If you will take pains to investigate the unwritten history of such cases you will find in almost every instance a skeleton whose rattling bones drove that daughter or wife from her home into public life.

I knew the daughter of a man whose riches were counted among the hundreds of thousands, and yet she was obliged to resort to petty ruses and humiliating schemes to get a dollar of pin money. She was allowed to run large bills, which her father scanned and anathematized item by item each month, but he did not consider the female members of the household competent to carry a purse. When his daughter ran away and went on the stage as a third-rate actress, the world was shocked that she should leave her elegant home and devoted parents for the glare of the footlights.

Two women, who are working outside of homes for a livelihood, told me recently, with tears in their eyes, that they would consider themselves the most blest of mortals to be shut within the walls of some humble cottage, where only faint echoes from the world could reach them! Both women were driven from their homes by the skeleton of poverty. And yet I have heard one of these women commented on severely as "a bold seeker after notoriety." She is simply doing what she is compelled to do to keep the wolf from the door.

There is occasionally born into the world a woman whose whole nature rushes like the tide of a mighty ocean toward the shore of some especial career. Rosa Bonheur was one of these, the first Mrs. Siddons was another, Anna Dickinson was another. In each of these women the force of peculiar genius was so great that no perfection of home life, no opulence of wealth could have kept her from fulfilling her destiny. They did not choose a career, a career chose them:

The rule is that the women who pursue the hard path of a public career, which deprives them of a quiet domestic life, are women who have been driven into it by stern necessity.

To be queen of a happy home, loved and appreciated by a kind husband and little children, to live only for their approbation and respect, surely this is the grandest and truest sphere possible for woman. It is the only genuine happiness which earth affords, all else is a mere imitation. In no reform can women do a work so beneficial to mankind as increasing the number of happy homes in the land.

But this work is not given every woman to do. Good husbands, who will love, respect, appreciate and support their wives and daughters do not stand on every threshold ready to lead all women into this earthly paradise. And, therefore, it is every woman's duty to be prepared to meet the world single-handed.

If I were blessed with a daughter I should teach her some method of self-support as religiously as I should teach her to love God. But my daily prayer would be that she might never go forth from the shelter of the parental roof, save as the queen of a good husband's home.

The Driven-Well Patent.

Many architects, as well as farmers, will rejoice at the decision of the United States Supreme court, which declares the patent of Nelson W. Green, for the process of drawing water from the earth by driving a tube down to the water-bearing stratum, to be invalid. The basis of the decision is the fact, proved by evidence, that driven wells of this kind were in use in New York State two years before the date of Colonel Green's patent. As everybody who took any interest in the subject knew years ago that driven wells by the score had been sunk before the date of the Green patent, and that the patent was for that reason invalid, we imagine that the most conspicuous result of the decision will be the calling of public attention very forcibly to the disgraceful delays of justice which have become characteristic of this country. Ever since the issue of the patent, which never had any validity, and which a great many people must have known at the time to be worthless, the patentee and his representatives have been collecting royalties, at exorbitant rates, on driven wells all over the country, and have, in the fifteen years which have elapsed between the granting of the final declaration of its invalidity, amassed fortunes, which, under the law, they are not required to refund to those who have paid them money on a claim well known to be worthless. As the patent would have expired in a year or two, the moral of the story, which will not be lost on unscrupulous persons, is that an invalid patent, once granted, is just about as good for extracting money from the community as a valid one, and that as the Patent-office examiners could not, even if they were not expected to leave that office to the courts, inquire into the originality of every device submitted to them, an earlier invention, which has not been patented, may be boldly appropriated, and, in the face of overwhelming testimony as to its previous use, be employed to collect tribute at discretion during the years which must elapse before an end can legally be put to the imposition.—American Architect.

The New Death Dealer.

London News.

Mr. Crawford writes: "I may mention that some days ago I was shown the bullet of a new Lebel gun. There can be no harm in describing its appearance, since in the event of a war these missiles would be the first thing to fall, or rather to fly, into the enemy's hands. Besides, the Germans are known to have stolen a few at Belfort. In shape it is conical, but the tip is slightly flattened. It is a trifle under one-third of an inch in diameter and somewhat over one inch in length. The bullet is made of a shelf of German silver, about one-twentieth of an inch in thickness, filled in with alloy of lead hardened with antimony."

Venus and Jupiter.

Youth's Companion.

The morning starlit sky is radiant with the presence of the two brightest stars that shine among the myriad hosts that stud the heavens. These radiant stars are the planets, Venus and Jupiter. There is no need of pointing them out, for they will be recognized at a glance by the observer of the southeastern sky in the early morning.

Venus now rises about four o'clock in the morning, and Jupiter about half an hour later. The former then rises three hours and a quarter before the sun, and the latter two hours and three-quarters before the sun.

Observers will see that the shining orbs are rapidly approaching each other, the distance between them perceptibly lessening, each successive morning. The planets will not approach each other until Jan. 2, 1888, when they will meet and pass on the celestial road, Jupiter being nearly two degrees south of his fairer neighbor.

After the conjunction, as it is called, the planets will recede from each other. Venus will wend her way toward the sun, and Jupiter recede from him; the first growing smaller and less brilliant as she increases her distance from the earth, while Jupiter will grow larger and brighter as he approaches the earth.

The conjunction of Venus and Jupiter is a phenomenon of exceeding interest, for it is not often that the Queen of the Stars, and the Prince of Planets hang side by side in the heavens. Neither of them is in its brightest aspect. Venus passed her period of greatest brilliancy on the last of October, and Jupiter will not array himself in his most gorgeous apparel until May 21st, 1888.

What Cheese Can Do.

Norwich, Conn., Special: A religious meeting in the First Baptist church of this city was barbarously broken up the other night by a bad West side boy, who slipped into the church kitchen and dropped a pound and a half of effete Limburger cheese on the glowing stove. The boy had bought the cheese in New London, asking for the worst and oldest cheese in the market, and the man who sold it to him threw in the assurance gratuitiously that it would "break up any meeting, short of 'them anarchists,' inside of thirty minutes."

"Right after that cheese was dropped on the stove," said a member of the church afterward, "the oder of the damned poured poured in from the kitchen and smote us. It crept through the sanctuary and rolled laboriously up the aisles. Excuse me, but it was the most infernal odor that I ever smelled."

In the presence of the miasma the voice of prayer and exhortation was hushed, and the worshipers gathered up their wraps and bolted out of the building. The cheese exhalation followed them for a few rods and then gave up the pursuit. "It was a little short of twenty minutes," commented a member of the congregation, "from the appearance of the odor before the last man and woman were going down the front steps for home. The congregation would like to catch that boy."

A Country Boy's Wooing.

Poughkeepsie News.

Dr Thayer drew an excellent picture of a country boy's wooing at a music class and described how thoroughly a pair of huckleberry eyes ran away with poor John's judgment. He would have courting done in a plain, business-like way, not always in public, of course, but based on good sound common-sense principles. He had no sympathy for the old maid who was once a belle, and then a flirt, who in her life had separated many a loving, trusting couple; but the woman who was an old maid because she scorned to be the slave of any man he was ready to bow before. Many of the woes of wooing come from mismatching. Even in matching horses men are more careful than they are in making matches for themselves. The house occupied by marriageable girls nowadays generally has two apartments; the romantic, which is the parlor, and the matter-of-fact end, which is the kitchen. A lover ought to be admitted to both.

THE SNOW STORM.

So all night long the storm roared
The morning broke without a sun;
And when the second morning shone
We looked upon a world unknown,
On nothing we could call our own.
Around the glistening wonder bent
The blue walls of the firmament.
No cloud above, no earth below,
A universe of sky and snow!
The old familiar sights of ours
Took marvelous shapes; strange domes and towers
Rose up where sty or corn crib stood,
Or garden wall, or belt of wood;
A soft white mound the brush pile showed;
A fenceless drift what once was road;
The bridle post an old man sat,
With loose flung coat and high cocked hat;
The well curb had a Chinese roof;
And even the long sweep, high aloof,
In its slant splendor seemed to tell
Of Pisa's leaning miracle.

—JOHN G. WHITTIER.

JOINED BY FATE.

There is a romance in every life, one stranger than the wildest planned by imagination, could it but be told. There is perhaps no one but owes all his happiness or woe to something that happened seemingly by chance.

My own life has been a complication of "if's," like a helpless hulk tossed by every wind, with chance at the helm. Until 16 it had flowed like a summer brook—not a ripple nor a rock. I had settled into the daily round of a country clerk, building as my brightest castle a modest store and myself its head. Life was fast drifting into a formula, like to-day, to-morrow and the year. But at 16 came a current which turned the needle of my life through the whole arc. Marvel not when I say that a woman's face changed my whole destiny.

She was a summer guest. I had seen her many times before, had wondered at her shyness and admired her retiring beauty, but all with only passing wonder. But once she passed me in the forest. It was a summer evening, warm and still. The sun had just set and twilight was stealing on. I had left the path and was seated on a mossy stump when I saw her, coming toward me up the path. She passed quite near me but did not see me, and I noticed the flower-like beauty of her cheek, the unconscious grace of her movements, her round blue eyes, and heard her low rippling voice as she called to her dog.

My heart beat and passions all undreamed of sprang into my breast. I went home with my head full of dreams. Laugh if you will, call it fancy or passion, but I could think of nothing but that sweet face. The dormant passions had awakened from their sleep, love have began to reign, and my whole being claimed the awakener as its queen. Fancy played its lights about her and she seemed transfigured.

But, alas, she was a woman, I a mere boy; she was rich and accomplished, and I a poor clerk in a country store. There was a gulf between us, I could only worship from afar off, and hopelessly admire as the child did the star. Yet youthful fancy came to my aid, and with my whole soul I determined to make myself her peer.

What days were those of that bright summer! What tinted dreams, what airy castles! Would that there were a world of youthful fancy and perpetual first love! I haunted the forest now and fed on glimpses. Once we met and walked down the path together. O, blissful moments! But summer faded, and when it fled the ideal of my heart went with it. She never came back to her woodland retreats, and gradually she faded from my life; yet boyhood fancy is strong, and my brightest dream was to win a name, and then to woo her in her city home.

In the autumn I went to the academy, and from thence to college. Years passed. The world lost its newness and romance as I grew older. I laughed at my boyhood fancy and laid it away amid other wrecks of youthful dreams. Yet now and then a misty face would float from the cloudland of other days and the old feeling would return. Unconsciously she had turned the current of life and was the ideal of my heart.

* * * * * * * * *

It was hard luck surely. Not a moment had I slept the night before, and I had worked all day long amid the horrors of a railroad wreck, when, just as I had got in the last despatch for the morning edition and was congratulating myself upon a quiet night, there came over the wires:

"Terrible murder at R——! Report at once."

There was no dodging it. With the fatal sin peculiar to the reporter, I cursed the luck and pulled out my watch. Ten minutes of 8. I could catch the 8 o'clock train and arrive at R—— by 9.

But the train was late, and it was 10 o'clock when we stopped at the deserted little station of R——. It was a lonely place. Here and there a light shone from the windows of a farmhouse, but the greater part of the little village was in darkness.

I sought the hotel where the sleepy hostlers informed me that the murder had been committed five miles further on at a little hamlet among the hills. "You can't miss it," he said; "take the road straight ahead, and keep going; there are no branches."

I had a few misgivings, but set out at once. The night was warm, but dark and foggy. The horse which I had procured at the hotel was a staid old creature, and jogged along in the most comfortable manner. I sank wearily against the folded back of the buggy letting him take his own pace. The farmhouses by the roadside were dark. Showers of perfume floated from the lilacs and cherry trees in full bloom in their yards. Now and then a watch dog would run and bark drowsily as I passed. I was utterly exhausted, and must have fallen asleep, for the next thing I remember is of arousing myself and finding that we had stopped.

I groped for the reins and spoke to the horse, but nothing stirred. There was a faint glimmer of light behind me, but elsewhere the blackness was Egyptian. I rose to feel for the horse, but my head struck something solid, which staggered me for a moment and I fell back upon the seat.

I was terribly confused. Where was I? Why should the horse not go, and what meant this terrible blackness and closeness? Then what had struck me? Only a few moments before I had been riding in the open air under the trees. I must have been asleep. I put up my hand and found a beam above my head. Was I in a building of some kind? I cautiously crept out over the wheel and landed upon a board floor, but at the first step I ran into a wall. I grew more and more confused every moment. Great heavens! Where am I?

I turned and groped toward the glimmer of light behind me, but ere I had taken ten steps I felt the boards giving beneath my feet. Great God, I was sinking through the floor—into what? Down, down—I caught at the boards, but they gave way. My heart struck; a blaze flashed before my eyes; I lay unconscious.

When I came to myself, I was lying on my face on a hard ground floor. The darkness was without a ray of light. It was damp and cold, and my hand struck a rough wall. I could not think; my head was swimming round and round, and the blood was streaming over my face from a cut in my forehead.

My God, where was I? Almost automatically I arose and groped about me. I seemed to be in a sort of cellar, with walls on all sides. Several times I stumbled and fell, but still I groped on, without thought, simply by a sort of instinct. I came upon some stairs, and climbing them found myself in a narrow passage, terribly dark, at the end of which was a door—fastened.

I was almost insane. How I came in such a position I could not as much as conjecture. The whole affair seemed like a horrible nightmare. I could not collect my thoughts for a moment. My head seemed ready to burst; it seemed as if I had been wandering for weeks, and I had but one impulse, and that almost to insanity—to get into the open air.

I tore at the door like a mad man. I wrenched it with all my power. Again and again I threw my weight upon it without thought or reason. At length it gave way.

It opened into a room with a glimmer of light at the end, but as I rushed in I overturned some tall thing—a table probably covered with dishes and pans. It fell with a terrible racket. My heart fairly stood still, for above the din I heard a piercing scream.

Almost dead with terror I still advanced toward the light, which evidently came through the key hole of the door. The door was locked, but in my frenzy I dashed it down and staggered into the room. A candle was burning. A large man half dressed stood in the middle of the room, and behind him a woman. Both were pale and excited.

"Good heavens, it's a mad man!" whispered the man hoarsely; his face is covered with blood; he will murder us all; he's got the strength of a devil."

He seized a chair. A frightened child was crying in another room. A door opened and I saw the pale face of a woman peering from the staircase. Great God! it was a face I knew—the face of my boyhood fancy. It was a dream—a nightmare. I gave a cry and staggered forward. The man raised the chair—I leaped toward him and he felled me senseless to the earth.

Weeks and weeks and months it seemed to me, I lay in a pleasing languor—a long eventless dream. Once I remember hearing a single restless fly droning above me. I opened my eyes for a moment, there was a halfdarkness about me and I was in bed, but I did not think. I did not wonder. I remember listening to the drowsy hum as it crossed up and down, over and over, now near and now away. I had no thoughts and I let it lead me. There was a blank when it stopped for a moment. By and by it grew fainter and died away in the distance, and again I was in that dream without events.

Again I opened my eyes. In the twilight of the chamber I saw a woman by the bed; a little white face with blue eyes and flaxen hair. My eyes followed her as she trod noiselessly about the room.

"Now go to sleep," said a soft voice, and again I was wandering, but now in dreamland. Pictures melting into each other like dissolving views, floated around me, but through them all peered the same face, misty and beautiful, in a shifting setting of clouds.

I awoke and she was still by my side. My mind was at length clear, and for the first time I tried to gather up my confused recollections.

"How came you here?" I cried at length. "How came I here—where am I?"

"Come, you mustn't think now—you must go to sleep again, I will tell you by and by," said the soft voice.

"But I must know. I shall be insane if I don't—I will know!"

"O, it is nothing, only you got asleep and the horse, which had once belonged here, turned into the barn."

"And you—"

"I am here spending the summer. Now go to sleep; you have been very sick."

What days were those of that summer, when I was convalescing and she was my nurse, and walks in the fields and woods with her as my guide; what wonder the summer flew.

"How strange it seems," she once said, "and what a curious chance it was that gave you that telegram, that procured that horse of all others and turned him in at his old home, and that blinded you and brought you by force to me—to say nothing of the fate which drove me to this little town to settle in this old farmhouse. I almost tremble to think what a near escape it was, and how near you came of going by."

But however it may be, I shall always bow to chance, for she gave me the dearest little wife in the world.—Maine Farmer.

Looks Like Ben Butler.

Senator Davis, of Minnesota, is doomed to hear it stated several thousand times this winter that he looks enough like Ben Butler to be his son. This is due in great measure to a fact that occasions the new Senator from Minnesota more trouble than a little. A year ago in a political campaign, he sat in the full glare of an electric light at an open-air meeting on a chilly night. He caught a severe cold, and his left eye seemed for the time paralyzed. For a time it winged him completely. He has now become accustomed to it. The sight is not restored, though the vitality of the eye may return as suddenly as it vanished. The misfortune to his eye has greatly increased Senator Davis' resemblance to old Ben Butler, which has always been a subject of remark.—[Washington Cor. Milwaukee Sentinel.

The Story of a Voice.

Charles E. Coon, ex-Assistant Secretary of the treasury, sat smoking a cigar late one evening in the corridor of the Fifth Avenue Hotel. He had just returned from the opera and was enjoying a cigar before going to his room.

"Yes, the opera was very fine to-night," said a voice near him. He turned and saw a man well dressed, leaning on a cane, and like himself quietly smoking a cigar. Mr. Coon did not recognize him, but thought he might be a lover of music, and mechanically replied, "Yes." The unknown coolly sat down on the settee by him and said. "You have a tenor voice, but you have never aspired to sing, and do not know what lyrical ambition is."

After waiting a few minutes and receiving no reply he continued: "I lost a golden opportunity to become a great singer, and ever since I have been a disappointed man. Seven years ago I was in Russia, and while there I began to sing. I discovered I had a phenomenal voice, but absolutely had no control of it. I could go as high as F in altissimo without any effort. My means were moderate at that time, and I felt that my voice needed cultivation. One night in St. Petersburg I sang in a concert, and received quite an ovation. After the concert a card was handed to me, which read:

THE PRINCESS PROWCAROSKOW.

My heart fluttered with excitement, for I had heard she was not only young and beautiful, but a great patron of young artists. I shall never forget what occurred after I met her."

He paused and said nothing for a few moments. Mr. Coon was interested and naturally asked: "Well, what did occur after you met the Princess?"

The unknown's voice grew sad as he continued his narrative: "She said I had a wonderful voice and it ought to be cultivated. I was invited to see her at her palace, and entertained in a style befitting a king. Instead of thinking of my voice I fell desperately in love with the princess. But she did not return my love; she only admired my voice. One day she told me if I really loved her I would accept money and go direct to Paris in order to complete my musical education. I consented to go, and was told to come back to the palace the next day for instructions. When I saw her the next day a sad look was on her beautiful face. She said she had heard bad news from a dear friend at Geneva, and asked me if I would not consent to stop there on my way to Paris and deliver a sealed package. Without hesitating I took the package and started on my journey. I swore to the Princess when I parted from her that I intended to return a great singer and win her love with my voice. On my way to Geneva I was arrested and the sealed package sealed my doom. The Princess was a Nihilist, and was making me the means of communicating with another member of the confraternity. I was sent to Siberia to serve a term of five years. Oh! the torture, the misery I endured in that wild, desolate country. Better death outright a thousand times than imprisonment in that cruel, barren country. For a year I was so crushed in spirit I could not form my plans of escape. Finally I found that my jailer was susceptible to certain influences, although really at heart a noble fellow, and I escaped."

Mr. Coon looked at the narrator and then asked: "And how did you influence the jailer?"

"I worked upon his feelings with a long and pathetic story, and he not only let me escape but he gave me half a dollar to spend on the way."

"Well, here is a quarter for your voice, now go," said Mr. Coon, as the Russian exile fled out with his phenomenal voice still uncultivated and thirsting for dampness.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

How a Dime is Coined.

Just at present there is a lively demand all over the country for silver dimes, and hundreds of thousands of dollars of them are being shipped to New York, Chicago, Cincinnati, St. Louis and other eastern cities. Two of the money presses are, and have been for some time, running exclusively on this coin. The demand is so great that these machines are not even stopped on Sundays, and will be run on that day through the present month.

The process of dime-making is an interesting one. The silver bullion is first melted and run into two-pound bars. These in turn are run through immense rollers and flattened out to the thickness of the coin. These silver strips are then passed through a machine, which cuts them into the proper size for the presses, the strips first having been treated with a kind of tallow to prevent their being scratched in their passage through the cutters. The silver pieces are then put into the feeder of the printing presses, and are fed to the die by automatic machinery at the rate of 100 per minute, 48,000 dimes being turned out in a regular working day of eight hours. As the smooth pieces are pressed between the ponderous printing dies they receive the lettered and figured impression in a manner similar to that of a paper pressed upon a form of type; at the same time the piece is expanded in a slight degree, and the small corrugations are cut into its rim. The machine drops the completed coin into a receiver, and it is ready for the counters' hands.

The instrument used by the counter is not a complicated machine by any means, as one might suppose. It is a simple copper covered tray having raised ridges running across its surface at a distance apart the exact width of a dime. From the receiver the money is dumped on to this board or tray, and as it is shaken rapidly by the counter the pieces settle down into the spaces between the ridges. All these spaces being filled the surplus coin is brushed back into the receiver, and the counter has exactly 1,520 silver dimes, or $125 on this tray, which number is required to fill the spaces. The tray is then emptied into boxes and the money is ready for shipment.

The dime does not pass through the weigher's hands as does the coin of a larger denomination. One and one-half grains is allowed for variation or "tolerance," in all silver coins from a dollar down, and the deviation from the standard in the case of the ten-cent pieces is so trifling that the trouble and expense of weighing coins of this denomination is dispensed with.

FARM, FIELD AND FIRESIDE.

Hints on Behavior.

Every girl should aspire to be lady-like. There are certain marks of a lady, no matter what her surroundings or circumstances may be. These are a gentle voice, refinement shown in choice of language, and neatness in her dress. Few need plead want of time as an excuse for untidiness, for if love of order and neatness are innate in the character they will prove themselves, even when the hands are burdened with cares. And there is no excuse for slang, exaggeration or affectation in language, except ignorance or natural vulgarity.

Little children should be allowed to develop slowly and naturally. There is nothing more dangerous than the way some people try to stimulate the dormant intellect of infant children, often playing with the helpless baby and tossing it up till it trembles with excitement. Babies, like all little animals should be left in a passive state. The most dangerous brain diseases to which infants are peculiarly subject are brought on by overfond parents, who refuse to let the faculties of the child remain in a half-dormant state, as they should during the first year of life.—New York Tribune.

Don't make the people at your table eat more than they wish to; particularly don't urge on them anything that is one atom questionable by debating its merit, and so sending a challenge to a polite person to accept more of it (as a proof of its superior quality) than is agreeable or profitable. Even if an entire meal should prove a failure, it is better to order it quietly away than to load the stomach of your victim with uneatable food. The temporary discomfort of being a little unsatisfied is soon cured, while eating of indigestible food carries its reminder in physical suffering for several days.—Good Housekeeping.

For the Cook.

CORNFLOUR PUDDING.—Dissolve two tablespoonfuls of corn starch in a cup of milk, add a pint of boiling milk, half a cup of sugar, and a stick of cinnamon. Boil until it thickens. Take out the cinnamon, put into a greased pudding dish, spread over it a layer of cranberry sauce and the beaten whites of two egg. Bake until brown.

A very delicate breakfast for an invalid is the following: Take some rice that has been boiled the day before and set away in a flat dish until morning. Cut in slices; brush each slice over with melted butter; slightly grease the broiler, and toast each slice over a slow fire to a delicate brown. Butter the slices and serve with a poached egg on top.

PORK FAT.—If you wish lard in its purity get leaf lard, cut it in half inch pieces, try out and strain into tin pails. In roasting fresh pork, or frying salt pork, there is always a good deal of greese that is unfit in its present state for table use; this, it skimmed off, strained and put away to become firm, is excellent for pie-crust, frying crullers and the various uses to which lard is put, as it is slightly salted and is purer than the article as often sold in the stores.

STUFFED CABBAGE.—Take a fresh cabbage and remove the center; fill the cavity with a stuffing made of cooked veal or chicken, chopped very fine, seasoned very highly, and rolled into balls with yolk of egg; tie the cabbage firmly together and boil about two hours.

Knitted Rug.

This is a beautiful rug made of different colored worsteds, and the stripes of equal width. But if the short pieces accumulate the wool can be then mixed up in changeable hues and thus used to advantage.

Knit with two large steel needles a plain strip about five inches wide and of sufficient length to handle easily. Then wet and iron it to make the worsted crimpy. Double it through the middle and sew the two outside edges to a foundation (the size of your rug) commencing at the centre and sewing round and round. Then cut it through the center of the knitting and ravel it out so as to make it look shaggy. It will need no trimming and it wears well.

Coquetry After Marriage.

It is easy to advise wives to dress to suit their husband's taste, but where time and money are lacking it is not always so easy to follow the advice. Still, apart from the desire of pleasing her husband, which, of course, should be the main object of a wife, let me whisper that if she have a request to make, she only is wise who goes to the battle with a pretty gown (albeit only of print), becomingly arranged hair, and a neat collar. Women are born coquettes, but too many of them lose their coquetry just when they need it most—after marriage. For the sake of your own happiness then, if for no higher reason, make the best of such charms as nature may have given you. Do not make the mistake of thinking your husband will like you better or appreciate it if you sink the wife and sweetheart in the slave. He will not, he will merely treat you as a slave.—Country Gentleman.

How to Cure Corns.

Corns may be nipped in the bud by a prompt treatment with kerosene oil. Cut the corns down as much as possible without making them sore, then rub on the oil, night and morning. If the corns make their appearance between the toes, wet a piece of tissue paper with the kerosene and put this between the toes over the corns. Keep it there all day while the feet are dressed and renew it night and morning. If the corns are young they will speedily vanish. Those of long standing will finally succumb. Take the substance which sticks to the side of a soft-soap barrel after the soap is used and mix with pulverized white chalk to the consistency of a salve. Apply every twelve hours in a rag until the corn is removed. It will cure every case of corns in six days.

Air Your Bed-Rooms.

Incredible as it appears, in these days of comparative enlightenment, when people generally are beginning to believe that a few simple, common-sense precautions for maintaining health are better than a great deal of dosing and nursing in order to regain it (in other words, that the best medicine is preventive), there are still some individuals who seem to want knowledge of the primary rules of hygiene. These persons, whose homes are filled with everthing necessary to comfort, and even luxury, never know what it is to have a thoroughly aired room from the beginning to the end of the winter. When the mild days of spring return they feel a desire for air, and the windows are opened to cool the house. Even then, however, their beds must be made as soon as possible after being vacated, and the sheets are hurriedly "smoothed up," and snugly covered by blankets and spreads, burying them away from the sweet, purifying air that would make them wholesome for occupancy on the following night.

No wonder such people are constantly ailing and miserable; that their hearts often palpitate, and their livers as often "don't act."

That our internal mechanism is "fearfully and wonderfully made" is a well-known fact; and this wonderful machinery can not long continue in good working order unless supplied with pure air is an item of wisdom not so widely diffused. The machinery is "self-feeding," and needs to be placed under proper conditions, when it gives its owner no further trouble. —Philadelphia Press.

Short Farm Items.

Land values have rapidly and permanently increased in this country in the last fifty years. This is especially noticeable in the "jumping" West, along the lines of new railroads.

Land values must continue to increase generally, because the available area of land in the country is now so small as to render inevitable its entire absorption in a few years.

That was a curious bargain a farmer made with a laborer, to dig his potatoes for "one potato a hill." Of course this contract did not confine the laborer to a selection from each hill; so he took the largest wherever found. These averaged about half a pound in weight; and as there were 4,000 hills to the acre, his share was just one ton, or 33 1-3 bushels, and at 60 cents a bushel they amounted to $20. He dug at the rate of one-fourth of an acre a day, making his daily wages $5. It took over one-fourth of the crop to pay him.

Realizing the fact that the boys and girls of to-day, will be farmers and farmers' wives of a quarter of a century hence, how important that they be not corrupted; that they be elevated and ennobled; that they be encouraged to study, think, investigate, that they may be better men and women, better farmers and farmers' wives than we. Oh we cannot be too careful with our boys and girls! They are the hope of the nation.

A horse for use does best with just enough food to replace the waste of his system and of a kind to keep him "feeling well." More than that is a damage in every way. He wants a little fat under his skin, a little between his muscles and less, but some, about his bowels. If he gets fatter it collects about the heart, impairing the force of its action; it infiltrates the muscular tissue, lessening his strength; it accumulates about the digestive organs, weakening their efficiency. He can not get rid of it as the cow does by discharging it into her milk. It "wads him up all over," as a good horseman puts it, making him less serviceable, less vigorous and more subject to all sorts of ills that horses are heir to.—Rural New Yorker.

Profitable Protection.

A prominent fruitgrower is quoted in "The Canadian Horticulturist" as estimating that the time spent in laying down and covering grapevines in autumn paid him (in increase of the next season's crop) at the rate of $100 a day while so employed. "The Country Gentleman" cities other witnesses to the same purpose:

A vineyardist showed us the fine condition of his vines of hardly American sorts, which had been simply prostrated and held dow by placing common fence rails upon them; and he found the grapes to ripen about one week sooner the following season than on vines which had been entirely exposed. Another large vineyardist, who had tried the experiment on a small scale, assured us tha a few days' work on his plantation as winter was setting in would have been worth more than $1,000 to him, the winter having been one of great severity. But as he expected winters generally would be milder, he did not adopt the pratice for the future."

The labor of laying down is believed to pay even in the case of the hardy varieties in the colder States. Covering with two or three inches of soil may not be necessary except in regions of severe climate, or with the tender native sorts having well-ripened wood:

"Intermediate between the efficiency of covering with earth and merely prostrating them is applying a cover of evergreen branches a few inches in thickness. There is no danger of this light and dry protection rotting imperfectly ripened buds and wood and the branches serve to retain the snow which the winds blow over them and afford protection."

Fodder Corn.

I have been preaching thin planting of fodder corn for more than ten years; for it not only gives a much better quality of feed, but I think that any one who will take pains to experiment will also find that it will give a much greater weight of cured fodder to plant as Mr. Gould recommends than to sow, as is so often advised, two bushels or more of seed to the acre; and I am not sure but that two stalks to the foot will be found better still. In the plots at the Ohio Experiment Station, sixty bushels of corn, small ears, and over 10,000 pounds of cured fodder, have been grown to the acre by planting one grain to every six inches of drill, and the drills 3 1-2 feet apart. The corn was weighed 70 pounds to the bushel, and this made over seven tons of corn and fodder to the acre, and I fully believe that this, if fed corn and fodder together, is superior to hay.—Col. Curtis in N. Y. Tribune.

Archbishop Ryan's Clever Scheme.

Archbishop Ryan, the Catholic prelate of Philadelphia, who was here a few days ago, on his way to Rome, is remarkable not only for his big brain and massive head of red hair, but for a certain bonhomme and story telling faculty that makes him a welcome guest among the more austere of his clerical brethren.

He believes in the bright things of religion, and one of his principal and firmest articles of faith he often expresses in this way:

"I don't believe in allowing the devil to have a monopoly of all the good music."

There is a story connected with this question of music in the Catholic churches which is worth telling, and the eloquent Archbishop of the Quaker City often takes pleasure in relating it.

There has always been a strong opposition among some of the extremely ascetic prelates of the Church against the singing of the great masters. The old boys deem them unchurchly and void of pious sentiment. They want nothing heard within the walls but the plain Gregorian chant of centuries ago.

When the last Council of the American Catholic Church met in Baltimore it was well known that the gravest and most reverend of the fathers had resolved to bring up this question of church music for discussion.

The Archbishop was not an archbishop then. He was a sort of coadjutor to the Bishop of St. Louis. He and several others of the progressive element got together and resolved to give the cowled abbots and heavy theologians a surprise.

The proceedings were to open with a solemn high mass, and before the day set for the ceremony the best singers in New York, Boston and Philadelphia were summoned secretly to the Monumental City. They took up Mozart's glorious Twelfth Mass and prepared it for the occasion.

When the day came and the Baltimore cathedral was crowded with its mitred prelates, its monks and its learned men, Bishop Ryan and his friends felt that the question of church music was to be decided that day, and it was.

Through the arches and up along the rafters of the grand old church rang out the sweet voices of the choristers like the singing of angels, and the sternest hearted among the great churchmen sat listening and entranced. When the ceremonies were over and the theologians were marching away to begin their deliberations the choir rang out with one of the sweetest of Catholic hymns, set to a patriotic air that stirred the blood in the hearts of the Americans among them.

The question of music was practically decided. This greatest of the fathers had learned under the spell of the sweet singing that true devotion mingled as much through the strains of that day's seraphic music as among the lowly notes of Pope Gregory's chant.

When the matter came up in the Council it was put quietly aside and never discussed.

But the auburn-haired prelate of Philadelphia says that he and his music-loving associates had labored to make that day's singing something that would ring in their hearts as sweet memory.—Graphic.

Human Hyenas in Arizona.

"The Apache Indian is a human hyena. He is an Ishmaelite, whose hand is raised against every living object, whether it be man or beast. He delights to kill. He is a fiend in human shape. He can no more be civilized than a tiger. Of the two, I believe him to be the more bloodthirsty."

The speaker was Mr. M. A. Smith, the delegate from Arizona Territory.

"We have numerous other Indians among us," continued Mr. Smith, who live in peace with the whites.

The Yumas and Papagas are susceptible to civilizing influences. The children go to school, while the elders till the soil and make an honest effort to support themselves. Not so the Apache. From the time he is so high (holding his hand a foot from the ground) he will bite, and steal, and murder if he can.

"There are five thousand of them on the San Carlos reservation. The government feeds and clothes them. For some unexplained reason it furnishes them with arms and ammunition also, although their food is provided for them. Notwithstanding this care, when they can steal away from the reservation they will kill every white man they meet.

"Speaking of this reminds me that a part of the Apache religion is the atonement for murder by blood. If an Apache is killed his nearest relations must immediately kill a white man, or else he is doomed to suffer eternal torment. It makes no difference if the kinship be ten degrees removed, or if he is obliged to travel a month before meeting his victim, the obligation is quite the same.

"Their religion, too, prevents them from committing a murder in the dark. If a dozen Apaches should discover you sleeping by your camp-fire at night they would not attack you until the sun came up. They believe if you kill a man at night their souls will walk in eternal darkness. Knowing this many of our people travel by night during the prevalence of Indian troubles in the Territory.

The French President's Perquisites.

From the New York Tribune.

The president of France is allowed firewood, candle and gaslight; men servants, the wages and board of whom the state pays, as well as the liveries of whom it buys, two carriages, a carriage for his secretaries, two military secretaries, three civil secretaries, house linen and cost of washing it, vegetables for his table from the ex-royal gardens, flowers for his greenhouse and ballrooms from the city nursery gardens, valuable preserves in the forests of Marly and Rambouillet, which not only supply his table with all the game it can consume, but enables him to put away about $9,000 a year. The president has a box at the opera and at the Francais paid for by his state. His sitting-room is fitted up with telephones, which enables him and his family to hear operas without stirring from his chimney corner. This, too, is paid for by the nation.

Tales of the Dark and Bloody Ground.

New York Sun.

It would do Price McGrath and John Harper good to see the Blue Grass horsemen of "Old Kaintuck" gather about a Hoffman House table these nights, drink whisky and talk of the old times of the race track. These Kentuckians are all such big men that three of 'em completely surround and fill up a table. They never seem to be able to fill themselves up. Major Dougherty, of Lexington, saw a man a night or two since who reminded him of a gallant young Kentcukian named Offatt, and an adventure Mr. Offatt had with his brother-in-law. He had a notion to forbid this brother-in-law to come to town while he was there. One day in coversation with Major Dougherty at a store door Offatt said: "Pardon me, Major, I want to speak to my brother-in-law for a moment," and seizing a double-barreled shotgun from the corner, he stepped quietly into the street, and riddled his brother-in-law for his disobedience. He returned without a word, leaving the dying man on the sidewalk, and was surprised that the Major didn't seem to feel like resuming their conversation where it had been interrupted. This same Offatt, who was the black sheep of a good family, told a friend who expostulated with him: "So help me Gawd, sah, I nevah killed a niggah in my life, 'ceptin' I war in liquor." At that time he had five notches on his stick, each of them figuring for a corpse he had made.

Another Kentucky story told at this table was by the handsome and gigantic ex-Mayor Walsh, of Hot Springs, Ark. He struck up a pleasant traveling acquaintance with a fellow passenger on a Kentucky railroad. As the train slacked up at a way station his new acquaintance said: "Excuse me, but you'd better move to one side, hadn't you. I see a man on the platform I may have a little trouble with, and you're just in line for a shot." Mayor Walsh moved, the shooting began, and when the train steamed away in a few moments the man on the platform was still there, and not likely to leave it except feet foremost. Then old Colonel Zeb Brown, Price McGrath's chum, and the same almost as a son to him, remembered walking down a street of Versailles, Ky., one day, and seeing a man on the opposite side of the street stop and kiss a very pretty woman. She was the kisser's wife, too, but she hadn't turned one corner before her brother, with a knife in his hand, turned another, and, before they could cross the street, the husband had received thirty-five cuts, and was dead, on his back. The brother-in-law, who had warned the husband he would kill him on sight, staggered away with a dozen or so cuts, leaving a bright red trail on the pavement.

Against Abbreviations.

From the Art Age.

One thing that always surprises foreigners is that, with our beautiful and original geographical names, we have so little taste as to disguise them in abbreviations. I heard a foreigner once say that he had a brother living in St. Paul, "Minn.," and he said "Minn." and not Minnesota, with evidently no idea whatever that "Minn." was a cheap abbreviation of a musical and romantic word. That we Americans write to our European friends, or even our American ones, as from Me., Mi., Mo., M., Mon., and Minn., is no credit whatever to our esthetic sense, and that we disguise in our public journals our lovely Colorado, California, Connecticut, Montana, Iowa, Idaho and Wyoming as Col., Cal., Conn., Ia., Io., and Wy., shows that we have no national sense of poetry and music. English people shortened their country names but their county names are tame prose compared with the breezy picturesqueness of our state and territory names. Beside, the English abbreviation is usually in the mere suppression of the word "shire," common to all their counties. The French are never too much in haste to treat their geographical names with disrespect, although the majority of these names are much longer than ours. The average American would consider it a sheer waste of time and ink to write Meurthest-Moselle, or Seine-Inferieure, or Pyrenees-Orientales, but what Frenchman would date his letter from M.-et-M., S.-Inf., or P.-O.? It would take much of the tinkle and trill, the sweet lute notes and echoes of pipe and tabor, from out our memories of Europe, if it was thus Americanized. An anonymous letter in Europe was once traced to an American because the word Vermont was written Vt., as none but one to the commonplace manner born would have written it. On the other hand a letter was once returned to its writer, who had just returned from a long residence abroad, by the postmaster of a remote Western hamlet, because he could not make out its destination. It was directed in full, Newburyport, Massachusetts. "O, you mean Mass.," said the postmaster, when the matter was explained. "Your writin' ain't very plain, I thought praps 'twas some furrin mistake o' your'n!" This is an actual fact, incredible as it seems.

The Baronet's Bargain.

From the Liverpool Courier.

Sir Thomas Lennard Barrett, who lived at Brighton, was one morning informed by his son that he (the son) was madly in love with the housemaid, and intended to marry her forthwith. The father was horror-stricken, but, being a wise man in his generation, decided not to quarrel with the boy. He therefore sent for his butler and offered him £1,000 if he would marry the housemaid by the following Thursday, to which proposal the butler assented with suspicious alacrity. On the fateful Thursday the Baronet sat in his study all day, in feverish anxiety for news that the marriage was an accomplished fact. As the day wore on, and no news was heard, he rang the bell and asked the footman whether the butler had returned. "No," was the reply. "But he took the check for £200?" "Yes, sir, and please, sir, he's took all the contents of the plate chest as well." "Ah, that's a bad job; but at any rate he has married Molly, the housemaid?" "Oh, yes, sir. He's married Molly. But, please, sir, he mentioned as 'ow he'd got a wife and six children in the North of England."

Many petitions are being presented to the Washington territory legislature asking the re-enactment of the women-suffrage law, but exempting women from jury duty.

The receipts of 73 railroads up to the middle of December kept up to the highest figures of the year, with the prospect that this highly flattering state of things will continue through a portion, at least, of 1888.

According to the Pacific railroad report, if justice were done, about six millionaires would be compelled to refund so much stolen money that they would cease to be millionaires, and would have quarters in some strictly managed penitentiary.

During the present season Fresno County, Cal., has shipped 4,000,000 pounds of raisins. This record is remarkable in view of the fact that a few years ago Fresno County was considered almost worthless from an agricultural point of view.

The observance of Sunday as the Sabbath was established by an edict of Constantine the Great, issued March 7, A. D. 321. The seventh and the first days of the week had previous to that time back to the resurrection, both been partially observed as Sabbath.

The official report of the speed trial of the new cruiser Chicago, leaves no doubt of her acceptance as a vessel of the navy. The tables accompanying the report show that the average speed obtained during the six hours of trial was 15.1 knots per hour; that the lowest for any hour was 14.38; and that during one hour not less than 16.35 knots was achieved.

One of the sure signs of the day that the public has lost interest in Wall Street speculation is the closing of a large number of branch offices of brokers which were formerly dotted all over the city. It was at these offices that transactions went on at night, and orders were given for the following day's business by uptown customers who preferred not to be seen in or not to go down to Wall Street.

During the season of navigation of 1887 there have been 11,758 clearances of steam and sailing vessels from the port of Chicago, and 11,702 entries, the value of whose cargoes aggregated $4,523,952—a goodly increase over preceding years. The import duties collected on machandise entered at Chicago from foreign ports during the year amounted to $4,734,950, an increase of over $300,000 as compared with the preceding year.

King Kalakua, of Hawaii, would have been dethroned recently had it not been for the presence of English and American men-of-war. The Honolulu rifle guards were brought out to overthrow his highness, but the English and American officers interfered. The king seems to have fallen upon hard times and his troubles are not yet over. He cannot always have a foreign fleet at his service, and when it departs he may be dethroned.

General Sherman astonished and grieved the New England banqueters at New York recently, by presenting figures intended to demonstrate that not New England, but the West is the living embodiment of the principles of our ancestors. He declared in 1863, when a basis for a proportionate draft was prepared and a credit and debt account of volunteer soldiers entered against each State, Illinois was 60,170 ahead; Massachusetts, 5,851 behind; Indiana, 25,511 ahead; Maine, 2,892 behind; Michigan, 5,238 ahead; Connecticut, 1,784 behind; and so on to the end of the chapter.

According to Major Powell, of the United States Geological Survey, the total value of the minerals produced in this country in 1886 was $465,000,000, beating the record of the United States or any other country. The gain over 1885 was $36,000,000, or about as much as a fair year's yield of gold. There is no reason to doubt that the total for 1887 will be more than $500,000,000, or about as much as the bonded debt of the country. In mining as well as in agriculture, internal commerce, growth of wealth and population, and many other things, we have distanced the world.

Senator Gorman is not among those who believe that the late Secretary Manning was a victim of overwork in the treasury department. He says in an interview: "The truth is that Mr. Manning had Bright's disease when he came to Washington to assume charge of the treasurry department. He worked hard and incessantly during the last presidential campaign, the effect of which was to break him down somewhat. He really never recovered from his great labors in the last presidential campaign. The insidious disease with which he was afflicted, and of the presence of which he was fully aware, was no doubt quickened by his labors during that campaign."

THE ANGEL PASSED BY.

Down through the village street,
Where the slanting sunlight was sweet
Swiftly the angel came:
His face like the star of even,
When night is gray in the heaven;
His hair was a blown gold flame.

His wings were purple of bloom,
And eyed as the peacock's plume;
They trailed and flamed in the air;
Clear brows with an aureole rimmed.
The gold ring brightened and dimmed,
Now rose, now fell on his hair.

Oh, the marvelous eyes!
All strange with a rapt surprise;
They mused and dreamed as he went;
The great lids, drooping and white,
Screened the glory from sight;
His lips were most innocent.

His clear hands shining withal,
Bore lilies, silver and tall,
That had grown in the presence of God;
His robe was fashioned and spun
Of threads from the heart of the sun;
His feet with white fire were shod.

O friend, with the grave, white brow,
No dust of travel hast thou,
Yet thou hast come from afar,
Beyond the sun and the moon,
Beyond the night and the noon,
And thy brother the evening star!

He entered in at the gate,
Where the law-givers sit in their state,
Where the law-breakers shiver and quake;
The rustling of his long wings,
Like music from gold harp-strings,
Or songs that the dear birds make.

None saw as he passed their way;
But the children paused in their play,
And smiled as his feet went by;
A bird sang clear from the nest,
And a babe on its mother's breast
Stretched hands with an eager cry.

The women stood by the well,
Most grave, and the laughter fell,
The chatter and gossip grew mute;
They raised their hands to their eyes,
Had the gold sun waxed in the skies;
Was that the voice of a lute!

All in the stillnes and heat,
The angel passed through the street,
Nor pausing nor looking behind,
God's finger-touch on his lips;
His great wings fire at the tips;
His gold hair flame in the wind.

A FOUR-LEAF CLOVER.

Out by the edge of the meadow, under an apple tree that was sending showers of delicate white and pink petals down to the grass with every breeze, lay pretty Nora Creely fast asleep. The soft and sweet scented leaves lay scattered all over her brown dress, and some nestled in her thick, dark hair, and one had fallen upon one of her eyelids, and reposed there as if pleased with the position.

Nora's arms were bare to the elbow, and were undeniably red and showed signs of toil, and her face was tanned and brown save where the healthy young blood showed through the brown. Her lips were parted, and between them were glimpses of white teeth that were the envy of all who saw them, and all who knew her saw them often, for she was always laughing and blithe, and, somehow, the rich color, dark hair and pretty teeth all seemed to belong to those beautiful blue eyes that looked so honestly out from under the heavy black lashes; true Irish eyes, than which none are more lovely.

Nora was only a servant, but she was an honest and conscientious one and a capable one, and her rich Irish voice used to troll forth those crooning old ballads that keep you vibrating between a smile and a tear. The children idolized good Nora, and the mistress leaned upon her, in sorrow and joy; the master spoke of her as a great treasure upon earth, and the dumb animals followed her about with words of love expressed in their dewy eyes.

Nora was happy, for it was the gift of her sunny nature to be so, and she never seemed sad or out of spirits, and so she was regarded as a sort of perpetual sunshine in the house.

Only one peculiarity had Nora, and that often surprised her gentle mistress. Nora was avaricious. She was a miser if ever there was one. She received good wages, and she never spent a penny that she could possibly save. She made her own poor clothes at night when she could have been resting, and she went barefoot, whenever the weather rendered it possible, —in short, she was evidently born a miser. Still Mr. Satterlee never said anything to Nora on that subject, thinking that as Nora earned the money she had no right to interfere in Nora's affairs.

Nora had lived with Mrs. Satterlee for seven years. She came as a child of fifteen, just after she had landed, a bewildered stranger in a strange land, and because of her cheery smile and honest eye, she had been chosen from among many others, and she went home with this gentle lady to a pretty country place, where she was always content, happy and efficient; as little children were born to the mistress, so were they born to the love of good, kind Nora, whose heart was a welling spring to warm affections.

Nora was now twenty-three, and there were few girls anywhere who were prettier, neater or better taught for one in her station, and there were two young men who thought her absolute perfection. One of them was a blacksmith and the other a horticulturist, but though Nora was kind to them, neither received the slightest encouragement. Sometimes Mrs. Satterlee wondered whether Nora would ever marry and have a home of her own, but she wisely let matters take their course.

Nora wrote to her parents and friends in the old country and received letters from them in return with a regularity that was a lesson to many other families, and save that Nora always sang and laughed more for a few days after the receipt of those letters, none could have ever noticed any effect. But the songs were more plaintive and the laughter not quite so rich and mellow; still she said nothing; but "baby," as they called her, a child of three, always hung around Nora's heels like a little dog at such times, until Nora would take her up and rock her to sleep. This day she had received three letters from home, but she seemed a trifle disappointed when she looked them over and missed one which she appeared to think ought to be among them, and after dinner was over and all her work done, and the baby asleep on the wide lounge, Nora went out to the meadow, through which ran a pretty brook, and where the clover was so rich and luxuriant that one almost longed to be a cow to revel in its juicy sweetness.

Nora sat down by the side of this brook and took the letters from her pocket and read them. One was from her father, one from a cousin and one from her sister, who was a widow.

Nora's eyes filled as she read the same old story of wrong, oppression and abuse, and she read of the coarse brutality of the agents who had turned out of doors friends, relatives and playmates; always the same, no redress. And now Nora's father wrote that Dermot Kelly's father and family were all to be evicted from the land the family had held for so many generations, and poor Dermot had just finished his studies, and was about to begin the practice of medicine, but this trouble would set him back for years. And then the father thanked Nora for all she had done for them, and sending untold blessings for her as a dutiful daughter, and in a postscript he added that he hoped she would not be too much discouraged by Dermot's troubles, nor tire of waiting for him to get established. "No, that I won't, until I am tired of living. Poor Dermot! I wish he was here. It is hard getting on in Ireland now, but, oh, what can I do more than I am now doing? I send them every cent I can spare, and it seems so little. There's no one else that could do anything if they were here to help themselves; let alone others. Ah, well! We are all born to suffer, and if it is the will of God we must bear it. This is a sad day for me."

And here Nora laid her face down among the clover and cried, not wildly nor boisterously, but patiently and wearily, and finally, worn out with emotion, she fell into an uneasy slumber, which grew sweeter and sounder, until finally she dreamed.

She dreamed she was back in her old home; that everything was just as it used to be. She saw her mother, in her short gown and petticoat, trotting about as usual, hunting for stray bits of dust on her spotless belongings; saw her sick sister, with her two children, and last, and sweetest of all, she saw Dermot.

He came walking up the lane with his elastic, strong steps, and she felt her heart beat with delight as he came and took her hand in his and bent his handsome dark eyes down to look into hers. And then they walked along the path that led to the old meadow and orchard, and there they sat down and talked over the future.

"Ah, Nora, my darling, I fear we shall have to find a four-leaf clover before we can be happy. It needs money to bring happiness in a strait like ours, and where could we find it if the 'good people' did not bring it.

"They don't believe in the 'little people' in America, Dermot, and I had almost forgotten them. I wish they might help us. I'm sure I've prayed to the Holy Virgin often enough for a way out of trouble, and have never found it. Perhaps the little folks will. Anyhow, I see no chance for us unless people at least show me where to find a four-leaf clover."

"None but the pure in heart and the unselfish in purpose ever find it, but if those qualifications would bring it, then you might be sure of it, Nora, for there never was another like you."

Just at this moment, Whiteface, Nora's favorate cow, came slowly up the meadow path, and seeing Nora lying there, she gave a gentle low. It woke Nora, and she could not for a moment remember where she was, and she lay still and looked around for Dermot, and slowly she began to realize that she had been dreaming, and she rose upon her elbow, and, strange to say, she grasped in her right hand a tiny turf of grass, and in the midst of it in plain sight, was a clover stem with four distinct leaves upon it. Wide awake now, yet remembering her vivid dream, Nora examined her priceless treasure. There was no mistake, but how had it got into her hand? Reasoners might assert that in her sleep she had clutched the turf of grass in which this clover grew, and that the whole idea was nothing but superstition, but Nora did not reason. She simply believed, and she was sure that in some way, as yet unknown, all would be made clear and straight. She knew it was the fairies who had placed that talisman in her hands. The rest would come.

She went back home and milked the cows and did her duties as deftly as ever, but now she felt herself a privileged mortal, holding a direct and tangible gift from the fairies, and her whole thoughts were thanks to God and the Virgin for the fairies' gift.

Two or three days passed, and nothing had come; still Nora was patient, and her faith great until one evening Mr. Satterlee came home and said to his wife:

"Minnie, what is Nora's other name?"

"Elnora Creely. Why?"

"You remember that cranky old woman who had the Marsh cottage one summer, when we were in the White Mountains, don't you?"

"The one who had the smallpox, and whom Nora went and nursed all alone?"

"Yes, the very one. Well, she's dead, and in her will she has left Nora $12,000, in token of the 'unselfish devotion with which Nora took care of a supposed pauper, from whom every one else fled.' So it was written in the will which was shown me today. After supper we will have her in and tell her of her good fortune."

So, when all was quiet, and all the children fast asleep, Nora was called in and told of her good fortune. She did not seem to be as much astonished as Mr. and Mrs. Satterlee thought the case warranted, still they thought it was surprise that kept her so silent. Said her mistress:

"Nora, I hope when you receive your money you will not grow to be miserly or avaricious, as that poor, lonely old woman did. It is a very unlovely habit, and one likely to make you very unhappy if you allow it to overcome you. I have often noticed in you a tendency to that fault, but then I thought you were trying to lay up something toward a home of your own, some day, or, at least, something for your future; but now that with care your future is provided for, I feel it my duty to tell you that money was made for reasonable uses, not for miserly hoardings, and you must be careful, or the habit will grow upon you, until you will be a despised and narrow minded miser."

"I, ma'am, I?" cried Nora, aghast; then suddenly she put her hand in her pocket, and in silence handed her mistress her father's letter. A few moments sufficed to show that Nora had, for all those faithful, self-sacrificing seven long years been depriving herself of all the things young girls love to have, and had been sending almost the whole of her hard-earned wages to Ireland, to those who would have starved but for it.

Mrs. Satterlee broke down and threw herself first into her good husband's arms and then into faithful Nora's, and mistress and servant cried together.

Nora's duty now called her to Ireland, and Mrs. Satterlee felt that she was losing what she could never replace. Still, she worked with all her heart to help Nora to get ready to go home as soon as possible; and when she left, there were more than the baby who cried for dear old Nora.

Thanks to her associations in Mrs. Satterlee's home, Nora was as ladylike and refined in her manner as any physician could desire his wife to be, and Dermot was a proud and happy man when his precious, faithful Nora was in his arms.

The poor old parents and the whole of her acquaintances were sharers in the little heritage that had fallen to Nora, but it lost its virtues, for the whole tribe, even to the seventh cousins, have prospered since Nora went back to Ireland. Dermot believes with Nora, that there was really something supernatural about the manner, in which she received that wonderful talisman, and they preserve it religiously, and Dermot repeats as Nora dreamed he did: "None but the pure in heart and the unselfish in purpose can ever find it."

Surely, our Nora deserved it.—Olive Harper, in Washington Critic.

An Understanding.

A polite-looking fellow went into a large clothing store in Chicago, and, approaching the proprietor, who had been pointed out to him, said:

"Would you mind doing something for a great cause?"

"I don't know. What is the cause?"

"You know that every effort is being made to keep the anarchists from being hanged?"

"I suppose so."

"You also know that a large percentage of your trade comes from people who sympathize with those unfortunate fellows?"

"Well."

"Now, I'd like to have you sign a petition asking the governor to do something for them."

"I am opposed to signing petitions."

"Wouldn't like to lose a large amount of trade, would you?"

"No; of course not."

"Still you are not willing to sign the petition?"

"Still I'm not willing."

"If I go back and tell the boys that you won't sign, you'll be the loser."

"All right."

"Not willing, then, to do anything!"

"Nothing at all."

"Wouldn't donate a coat to the cause?"

"What do you mean?"

"Wouldn't give me a coat to make it all right with the boys?"

"No."

"How about a shirt?"

"I won't give you anything."

"What will you give me to tear up the petition?"

"Nothing."

"What's that pair of pants worth?"

"Five dollars."

"Trust me till Saturday night?"

"No."

"What will you do?"

"Kick you into the street if you don't get out of here."

"Well, I'm glad that you are willing to do something—glad that my visit has not been wholly a failure. You don't believe I've got a petition, do you?"

"I don't care whether you have or not."

"What's that vest worth?"

"Get out of here."

"I'll go you. Nothing like getting down to an understanding."—Arkansaw Traveler.

A HUMAN BEAR.

It Looks Like a Bear, Crawls Like a Bear, and Acts Like a Bear.

A large party of Clayoquot Indians from British Columbia appeared in this city yesterday, says The Seattle Post-Intelligencer, on their way to the hopfields. Accompanying them is probably as curious a specimen of unfortunate humanity as ever was born. It is neither a man nor a brute, but appears to be on the line dividing the one from the other. Considered as a human being, the being is a man; considered as a brute, it is a bear. It looks but little more like a man than a monkey does, except that the features are a little more distinct and there is not a coat of hair on his body. It can not talk, or walk upright. It crawls along on its hands and feet with the peculiar swinging motion of the bear. Its feet are at a very acute angle with the front of the leg, and when crawling the hands move with an inward swing like the front feet of a bear. The expression is almost that of a bear. There is a peculiarly wild look about it, and the eyes are restless and sharp. Everybody instinctively called it "Indian Bear."

The Indains said they seldom take it along with them anywhere, but this time there was no one to stay with it. They say it is 20 years old. But little attention appears to be paid to it by the Indians, and it wabbles around with about the aimlessness of an old dog, seeking a warm place, and eyeing suspiciously the approach of anyone not familiar with it. The Indians say that a short time before its was born its mother was frightened by a bear.

Insects in Ears.

Few troubles are more annoying or more productive of serious difficulty, if not removed, than insects in ears. Lying upon soft meadow grass, or sleeping upon a campbed of fragrant spruce, bugs of different denominations seem possessed with a desire to inspect our auricles. Once inside, their frantic efforts to escape cause such agony that people have gone temporarily crazy with it. This may be instantly stopped by pouring the ear full of sweet oil, which suffocates the insect, and he is easily removed later by a syringe and warm water. Avoid intruding pins, etc., into ears. Much harm may thus be done to their delicate mechanism, and little to the cause of all the trouble. If oil is not accessible use water, which is almost as good.

Earache in any form may be quickly relieved by filling the organ with chloroform vapor from an uncorked bottle, vapor only, not the liquid; and mamma's bag should always contain a small vial of it, as it is useful in many ways. Ten drops upon a lump of sugar is an excellent remedy for hiccough or ordinary nausea, and I have recalled to life more than one person pronounced dead from sunstroke, with a half-teaspoonful, clear, poured down his throat.—Ex.

A discussion is going on in the scientific papers about the speed of a circular saw. It goes fast enough in Michigan to annul all the evil effects of oversupply in the matter of fingers.—Detroit Free Press.

FARM MANAGEMENT.

Where Soiling May Be Practiced to Advantage and Where It Will Be Unprofitable.

The Evolution of the System Since the Time All Farm Animals Were Pastured-Veterinary Quackery.

Will Soiling Pay?

This question is often asked, and generally answered in the affirmative, says The Chicago Times. An excellent presentation can be made on paper of the advantages of soiling. By abolishing pastures the cost of fences is saved. While it ordinarily takes about three acres of pasture land to afford grass enough to support a cow or steer during the grazing season, it has apparently been demonstrated that one acre will produce sufficient food if it is cut with a scythe or other implement, instead of being fed off. All the manure made by stock kept in a stable can be readily saved and kept in the best condition to apply to the land. Animals kept under cover during very hot weather are protected from the rays of the sun, and can be readily protected from the insects that are likely to annoy them when they are in the pasture. They are less liable to receive injuries, and are in no danger of straying off and getting into mischief. None of this food is likely to be wasted by being trod upon or soiled by their droppings. They lose no flesh by having to walk about in search of food. They can eat their fill in a few minutes and then lie down and ruminate and digest their food.

It is known that most, if not all, animals will take on flesh and fat faster if they are well supplied with suitable food and in partial confinement than they will if they are allowed to range about in a pasture. In the final process of fattening choice beeves, it is always thought necessary to limit their exercise and bring their food to them. Some say that young and growing animals derive as much benefit from this manner of feeding as animals that have reached their full size and are fed with a view of preparing them for slaughter. At present, I may advocate the policy of keeping animals intended to furnish flesh fat during the entire period of their lives, and the soiling system of feeding would seem to be best for securing this result. It is claimed that cows will give more milk during the season if they are fed on succulent food brought to the stable where they are kept, than if they have the range of ordinary pasture. If they do not give quite as much at a time as when pastures are in their best conditions, it is declared that the yield is more constant and of longer continuance, as the supply of food is more regular, and not dependent on the amount of moisture in the soil.

These great advantages are, of course, offset in whole or part by numerous disadvantages. Much labor is required to cut and haul to a stable the green food required to feed a number of cattle during the grazing season, and a still larger amount is needed to raise the fodder that is to be harvested. Grass and clover can not be relied on entirely or chiefly to furnish food for the animals that are to be kept in stable during the summer, though they will contribute to the amount required. Parsnips raised the previous season and allowed to remain in the ground all winter will be the first fresh food to use in the spring. These can be followed in turn by fall-sown rye, orchard grass, red clover, mixed grasses, oats, and peas, Hungarian grass or millet, sweet and common field corn, northern sugar-corn, pumpkins, squashes, beets, carrots, and turnips. Red clover can be cut at least twice during the season, and orchard grass four or five times. In many localities two crops of oats and peas can be raised. In Canada tares or vetches are sown with oats on farms where soiling is practical and in places adapted to its growth alfalfa is regarded as the best crop for soiling purposes, as the plants bear frequent cutting.

To arrange to have a succession of green plants from April till December may be easy in theory but difficult to put in practice. The season will hasten or retard the growing of cultivated plants as it will grass and clover. A drought will diminish the yield of plants employed for soiling purposes as well as that of plants in a pasture. For that reason persons who practice soiling are generally obliged to use considerable hay, grain, oil-cake, and millstuffs in connection with green fodder. If one has a well-filled silo he can employ ensilage to take the place of fresh plants when a drought renders them scarce. The soiling system is best adapted to countries where there is little liability to protracted droughts, or where irrigation is practiced and where labor is very cheap. Soiling may pay where land is very dear, but be ruinous where land is cheap. Few farmers in England practice soiling because the moist climate generally insures an abundance of grass in the pastures. The like is true in Holland, a country where land is high and labor low. If cotton and tobacco raising in the south ever gives place to stock-growing, it is likely that soiling will receive much attention, as pasturage is poor and wages are low.

In the early stages of agriculture and stockraising it is not likely that any of the domesticated animals were supplied with harvested food during the season that grass and other forage plants were growing. Even beasts of burden were turned out to graze when they were not at work. Horses, mules, and oxen were not put in the stable and supplied with hay and grain at noon and night, but were left to find food in a pasture or on an open range. It was at length found to be economical to put them where they could rest and to bring their food to them, and some discovered that it was unprofitable to allow horses to waste time in picking up food in a posture at any time. Hogs were at one time grazing animals, as sheep and cattle are now. No one kept them in pens except during the winter. They had the range of commons and forests, in which they found their living. The swineherds described by Sir Walter Scott in the Waverley novels were as common in England and Germany as the shepherd now is in most parts of Europe. He looked after the hogs on an estate as the modern "cowboy" looks after the cattle on a western ranch or range. He did not feed the hogs, for in those old days hogs helped themselves.

Probably the first man who shut up hogs and fed them during the warm portions of the year was ridiculed by his neighbors. They could not see the use of feeding hogs when they could "skirmish round" and pick up their own living on the commons and in the forests. Soiling hogs then was like soiling cattle now. Horses, mules, and hogs are at present generally supplied with harvested and often with prepared food during the grazing season. Many English farmers feed their sheep during the summer so as to obtain very superior mutton. They have succeeded in producing breeds of sheep that are too heavy to run over hilly pastures and gain in flesh. Soiling sheep has been found to pay on costly lands when mutton instead of wool is the object. The time may come when soiling cattle kept for producing beef or milk will be general among farmers who own costly land and who desire to make the most out of it.

Veterinary Quackery.

Dr. F. L. Kilborne, in a communication on this subject to The Rural New Yorker, writes: The rapid advancement made in the science of veterinary practice within the past few years has done much toward doing away with some of the enormous stock of veterinary quackery throughout the country. The various veterinary schools of this country and Canada yearly graduate several hundred young men; while not a few of the graduates of the foreign schools come to this country to locate in practice. But even with the yearly addition of this large number to our regular practitioners, the quack thrives in many places. His operations, however, are mostly confined to small towns and rural districts. There we still have men who, in their ignorance, persist in calling various diseases of cattle by the very significant (?) name of "hollow-horn" or "horn ail," and treat the cases in the approved "cow-doctor" style of boring the horns and filling them with terpentine, pepper, or other equally irritating and injurious agents, to torture the poor animal. In many cases the treatment is worse than the disease itself, and it is a wonder that so many cases recover under such barbarous treatment. Another will find "wolf in the tail," and the tail must be forth-with split and bound up in salt, pepper, tobacco or ashes. If the patient is so unfortunate as to be very sick, and the quack so learned (?) that he can find both "hollow-horn" and "wolf-in-the-tail," her case is indeed a sore one. The disease is then said to reach from her horns to the end of her tail, and in addition to the above treatment she must have the whole length of her back rubbed with soft-soap, turpentine, wet wood-ashes, or with some mysterious mixture which the quack will prepare himself, much after the manner of the "Indian medicine-man."

Possibly a cow may not be credited with having either of these diseases, but has simply "lost her cud;" where or how it was lost they do not attempt to explain. In fact, it is against their principles to explain anything, except to deepen the mystery surrounding the case and impress their hearers with their own importance. For the loss of cud they proceed to collect some elder, wild cherry, or other suitable shrubs, scrape the inner bark, and mix the scrapings with herbs and molasses to form a mass the size of the closed fist or larger. This artificially-prepared, mystic cud is then placed well back in the cow's mouth, with the expectation that it will take the place of the lost cud; that the animal will immediately begin to ruminate as usual, and that a speedy recovery may be looked for. Suffice it to say their expectations are never realized, except by accident, as it were.

One unusually self-conceited quack of my acquaintance confines his operations almost entirely to horses, and his treatment is almost always mercurial blisters. A ringbone, spavin, puff, or other swelling will always receive a severe blistering; so also with a case of pneumonia, sore throat, glanders, colic, or indigestion. He claims to have made many wonderful cures, including several cases of glanders (a feat no veterinarian ever accomplished), although his patients are constantly dying on his hands, his self-conceit will always prevent his seeing the folly of his course of treatment.

Like all other quacks, he is a firm believer in the theory that the pressure of the harmless little wolf-teeth in the mouth of the horse is injurious to and causes disease of the eyes. If a young horse has any trouble with his eyes, as he is very liable to have when cutting the large molars or grinders of his upper jaw, the wolf-teeth are looked for, and if present are ruthlessly knocked out, to cure a disease for which they are in no way responsible. If the wolf-teeth are not present, and the haw partially covers the eye, as the result of more or less inflamation (causing the so-called "hooks in the eyes") this important membrane is cut out, a very injurious as well as barbarious practice. This "horse doctor" has never read a standard work on veterinary science, and he has no regard for the opinions of any veterinarian which differ from his own set opinions. Such is the self-conceit and bigotry which most quacks add to their ignorance. They pretend to know all about the diseases of animals and their treatment, when in fact they know little or nothing. It was a quack who prescribed a dose of one-half pint of croton oil for a sick horse, and was only prevented from having his order carried out by the refusal of the druggist to fill such a prescription.

Inflate the Lungs.

The death rate usually increases at the beginning of cold weather, especially among the old and debilitated. It is the indirect rather than the direct effects of the cold which are responsible for most of this increased mortality. In trying to shield themselves from the cold too many deny themselves of needed fresh air, which is never purer nor more healthful than when cold. In fact, the great expansion of cold air by the heat of the body is one of the very best means of expanding the lungs, thus increasing their power and furnishing more animal heat to counteract the outside low temperature. No more invigorating exercise is possible than standing in a bracing cold air throwing the arms back quickly and taking through the nose as deep a breath as possible. This expands the chest, purifies the blood, and quickens its circulation. To get the fullest advantage from deep breathing it should always be done through the nostrils. Besides, in breathing through the mouth, the air, before it reaches the lungs, is more or less contaminated by matter in decaying teeth, and thus does not purify the blood through the lungs as it should. Right breathing is an important part of right living.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Encouraging the Lad.

The wealthy and penurious old gentleman was going east. He had a nephew who was a trifle rapid and was not overburdened with money. The nehpew was elated, for he felt sure that the old gentleman would give him something handsome before he left. It was the last moment on board the ferry-boat. The old man took him aside.

"Well, my boy, I'm going east," and he put his hand in his pocket and pulled out a pocket-book, which he opened. It was full of bank notes and the old man began fingering with them, as he went on, very pathetically: I'm going east and I hope you'll be a good boy and take care of yourself while I'm gone. If you're a good boy and behave yourself," and here the young man's eyes fairly glistened as he watched the old gentleman fingering the notes; "if you behave yourself while I'm gone—why—you'll please the old man very much."

And the old man put the notes back in his pocket-book and buttoned it up in his pocket again. The nephew's eyes were wet, but it wasn't with grief at the old man's departure.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Here we Are.

Pioneer Press.

If the Pioneer Press had delayed for twenty-four hours its comments upon a letter dealing with the southern question, it might have added to them a very pretty little illustration from a democratic paper which has much claim to be representative of the party, and which is by no means so ultra in its views as those published in the lower latitudes. Ever since the presidential election the Louisville Courier-Journal has been subject to eruption of double leaded editorials on various topics. It is now considering the question of a free ballot and a fair count, which is supposed to have been raised by a republican return to power. Here is a sample paragraph from its latest leader:

"The average negro in the cotton, sugar and rice belts of the south is no more fit to vote, or capable of taking care of his vote, than an orang-outang. Yet they made him a voter. We did not do it; they did it. They did it to crush us. The result has disappointed their expectations. It has returned, as they were warned it would return, to to plague them. And so, having eaten their cake, they are resolved to have it, even if to obtain it the south runs rivers of blood and wrapped in the flames of war."

There is a great deal more of this party stuff, concluding with an appeal for mutual respect and love, couched thus eloquently: "These will bring everything we want and need in God's own season; not the grinning death's head of a satyr like Ingalls, nor all the looney incendiaries, like Foraker, outside of hell." It is in view of such expressions of opinion that we venture to say that there is still a southern question, and that its existence is felt and maintained at the south. The corner stone of the belief and the policy that springs from it is in that opening sentence; in which Mr. Watterson declares the negro to be no more entitled to a vote than if he were an orang-outang. It is on that principle, regardless of anything in the constitution or the laws, that the south conducts its elections.

We are far from saying that the negro of the south is all that could be desired in the way of an intelligent voter. We do say that this and all attendant evils are intensified and perpetuated, to say nothing of the infamous effect upon party and government, by his systematic exclusion from the polls. We of the North recognize the presence among us of elements in whose hands the suffrage is not wisely or honestly exercised. There are even communities in which a majority belongs to that class. Yet nobody ever herd of a proposition to exclude them from the right to vote. Here and everywhere the virtue and intelligence of the community will rule in the long run; and it will do so far more surely in a fair and open competition than by an appeal to the bayonet or the shotgun. If the people of the south had accepted the situation in a fair and manly way, if they had recognized the new state of affairs and treated the negro as political equal instead of a political outlaw, the best men and the best party, no matter whether named republican or democrat, would have had no difficulty in winning the support of the negro vote to-day. But the leadership of violence is what they haves deliberately chosen in preference to the leadership of intelligence; and it is to that they hold in all the terms that brimstone regions can furnish them.

It is not, unfortunately, a question of local government alone. In the eight states bordering on the ocean and gulf, begining with South Carolina and ending with Texas, with the addition of the interior state of Arkansas, such a thing as afree and fair election is absolutely unknown. Those eight states sent to the Fiftieth congress a solid delegation of fifty-six representatives and sixteen senators. Not a republican was admitted among them. They made up, by mere arbitrary decree, more than one-sixth of the house of representatives and about one-fifth of the senate. These men are numerous enough to control legislation. These states furnish seventy-two votes to the electoral college. There is the crime which passes local bonds and becomes national. We have omitted those other states of the solid south wherein the democrats are a majority, but at least a semblance of honesty in elections is preserved. But, in these eight communities, many of them showing a steady decrease year by year in the popular vote, free suffrage and popular government no more exists than it does in Russia. We should not object to the seventy-two senators and representatives furnished the democratic party, if they were sent to Washington as the result of a free ballot and a fair count. Very likely that might be the result, if democratic leaders in those states cared to be fair and friendly in their dealings with the negro. But as long as they take by fraud and hold by force, as long as they proclaim from the housetops their "orang-outang" answer to the amendment to the constitution declaring that race or color shall not abridge the right of suffrage, just as long as is necessary and right that the party of such outrages upon onr institutions should be excluded from national control.

Northwestern Congregationalist: We kindly suggest to our friends who this year voted for Fisk and Brooks—acting according to their honest convictions,—that, in view of the fact, they calmly review the whole question in all its bearings and see if it is not possible for them to give their support to such measures as may commend themselves to the great majority of christian people in the furtherance of this great object. Prohibition is the thing we are all after; we differ only as to methods. The policy of antagonization, which has thus far been tried, is not likely to succeed under present conditions. It is a well-established fact that the refusal of a number of temperance people in New York state vote for a Christian man for governor, one in thorough sympathy with all good works, secured the election of a man who has become notorious because of his efforts in blocking the progress of temperance reform in that state. It is not pleasant to have this referred to as 'the only prohibition victory' in the election—and there is something of truth back of the slur. Let us try the policy of co-operation; let us work together instead of working apart; let us 'agree to differ' on subordinate questions, and give our united strength to the promotion of a large temperance sentiment.

Third Party Decline.

Minneapolis Journal: The New York Independent has compiled some figures on the vote of the prohibition party that are interesting and instructive. The estimates of the Voice are taken on the prohibition vote in all states except in New York and New Jersey, the only states in which the official vote is yet known. These figures cannot. therefore be accused of unfairness. The total prohibition party vote of the country estimated by the prohibitionists themselves at not more than 275,000. This is far short of the 1,000,000, or even the 500,000 votes that some of them anticipated, but the third party leaders are anxious to put the best face on the situation possible and speak of the gain of 125,000 over the number cast for St. John as encouraging progress. A study of the figures for the last three years shows clearly enough, however, that the prohibitionists actually sustained very heavy losses at the last election as compared with the highest vote in any previous year. The most notable instances of decline are as follows:

	Year.	Highest Vote.		Decline.
Connecticut	1886	4,669	5,300	269
Deleware	1886	7,835	357	7,478
Kansas	1886	8,694	7,900	1,061
Kentucky	1885	39,105	11,000	28,105
Maine	1886	3,873	2,700	1,173
Maryland	1886	7,195	5,832	2,363
Massachusetts	1887	10,945	9,000	1,945
Michigan	1886	25,179	23,000	2,179
New Jersey	1886	19,808	7,749	12,059
New York	1887	41,850	30,231	11,619
Ohio	1887	29,700	25,000	4,700
Oregon	1886	2,733	1,200	1,533
Pennsylvania	1886	32,458	22,400	9,958
Rhode Island	1886	2,585	1,300	1,285
Texas	1886	19,186	7,000	12,186
Wisconsin	1886	17,089	16,000	1,089

There have been some gains, of course, but a comparison of the gains, using their own doubtless very liberal estimates, only makes the case stronger. The following are most important:

	1886.	1888.	Gain.
Alabama	776	1,000	224
California	6,432	8,000	1,568
Florida	243	300	57
Illinois	16,766	21,000	4,234
Indiana	9,185	10,000	815
Iowa (1885)	1,594	3,000	1,406
Minnesota	8,966	16,000	7,034
Missouri	3,501	5,000	1,499
Nebraska	8,175	10,000	1,825
North Carolina	4,107	5,000	893
West Virginia	1,492	2,000	508

The figures show that the prohibition party has been at its best in the state campaigns—in the "off" years. It has more strength as a state party than as a national party, and yet, if it has ever elected a single state officer or member of the legislature in its whole twenty-five years of effort the instance is so rare that we have not heard of it. This is the party which is to kill off the republican party, and which is ready to obstruct and defeat, if possible, anything and everything in the shape of temperance reform, and temperance legislation, prohibition included, that does not proceed from itself as a political party. No wonder it is losing ground. The largest gain made anywhere was in Minnesota and they will not trouble anyone here any longer if the republicans are wise enough and patriotic enough this winter to pass a county option law.

A New Apportionment.

Moorhead Weekly News,

The last legislature shirked an important duty that the next cannot as easily escape. It is expected to make a legislative reapportionment of state. The last apportionment was made seven years ago, when the population of the state was not half as large as it is now, and when the total vote cast for governor was only 102,193, whereas in 1886 it was 220,494, and at the last election about 245,000. This doubling of population and of voting strength has not gone on regularly and evenly all over the state. On the contrary some localities have actully lost population, while others have gained six or eight times as much as they had in 1881.

A few examples will illustrate a condition of things that is growing worse every year. The first district, consisting of Houston county, is entitled to one senator and two representatives, or three members of the legislature. The vote of Houston county in 1886 was 2,835, or an average of 945 voters to a representative. Fillmore county constitutes the 2d district and is entitled to one senator and five representative or six members. The vote of Fillmore county in 1886 was 5,022, or an average of 837 votes to a representative. Blue Earth county, or the 10th district, has one senator and four representative to 5,550 votes, and Winona county, the 15th district, has six members 6,262 votes. All these districts are in the southern part of the state.

Hennepin county contains the 29th disricts—Anoka and Isanti counties being included in the 28th. The total vote of all three counties in 1886 was 38,113, while the total represenation in the legislatur was only 17, or an average of 1,950 votes to each member. That is more than twice as large a constituency to each member than is credited in the first or second districts. The 49th or Duluth district is placed at the greatest disadvantage. It includes the counties of Hubbard, Carlton, St. Louis, Wadena, Cook, Lake. Itasca, Cass and Aitkin. The total vote in 1886 was 7,472 and the delegation in the legislature consists of only one senator and one representative, an average of 3,734 voters to a member. The vote for 1888, although not official, makes a still worse showing than that of 1886. but the figures of 1886 are sufficient to show that the legislature of 1887 had no right to shirk the duty of readjustment of the representation to correspond with the changes in population. It is only a question of justice and a matter which ought to be taken up among the first things to be considered when the legislature meets—Minneapolis Evening Journal.

The above article is in the right direction as far as it goes, and it may be considered quite liberal for a Hennepin county news paper to acknowledge that the northern part of the state is entitled to a larger representation. According to the Journal's own figures Hennepin has been doing very well, though not quite as well as Houston and Fillmore counties. The 44th legislative district, comprising Clay, Becker and Wilkin counties cast at the last election, 5,848 votes, which would entitle it, on the basis of the Fillmore county vote of 1886, and its representation, to seven representatives in the legislature. It has one senator and one representative. There are other district even worse off than that; for example the 45th, comprising Polk, Marshall, Kittson, and Norman counties.

There should be an equal representation as nearly as possible of every portion of the state in the legislature. It is not supposed that when the apportionment is made it will provide for increasing very much the total number of senators and representatives in the legislature, as such a course might make the bodies too large and unwieldly, besides it would necessitate the building of a new capitol with enlarged chambers to accommodate them. But the plan will probably be to keep the total number of each house about where it is now. There are now 103 members of the house and 47 members of the senate. Say the number of representatives is left at an even 100 and the senators are increased to 50. The population of the state is, in round numbers, about 1,250,000. This would entitle every 12,500 people to a representative and every 25,000 to a senator. It can readily be seen what effect such an apportionment would have in reducing the number of senators and representatives from some or nearly all the southern counties, as well as in Hennepin and Ramsey, in the southern part of the state also, and the middle counties. What we want is to take away from those counties and districts which have more than their equal share and add to those counties and districts which are far behind in having an equal share. It is an outrage upon the people of the state that this matter has been put off so long. It should in all justice and fairness have been done two years ago, but that portion of the state which has profited by it would not listen to the pleadings of the outraged portion, because it would legislate a number of state senators who were elected for four years in 1886, out of office, and reduce the influence of the southern portion of the state in electing a United States senator this winter. These two reason will soon be removed and it is hoped that the people and members of the legislature in the southern portion will willing submit to be shorn of their usurped power. If not let them beware. The northern half of Minnesota will soon be in a position where it will be the dictator instead of the suppliant. The United States census of 1890 will bring us deliverance, and after that time, gentlemen of the south, you will have to remove to the north to get any political plums.

Drying off Cows.

Mirror and Farmer: In drying cows in the fall or early winter, when the milk is rich and thick and the cows, perhaps, a little feverish from change of feed and exposure to change of weather, there is more need of watchfulness than at some other seasons of the year when milk is poorer and more easily absorbed away. On on account should milk be left so long in the bag as to become thick. The best way to dry off cows is to milk daily or at regular periods, leaving back a part of the milk at each milking. This is the most effective way to diminish secretion. By this means the oldest milk in the bag will be drawn out and the newer secretion left back as a check to the formation of more. This practice will dry a cow of her milk at any time, though the flow may be very large. Should the bag show any indications of fever by its increased warmth, the exhaustion of milk should be nearer complete, or perhaps all of it had better be milked out for a while, till the fever is abated and the bag becomes soft and limp. Cows which are not in good health are more liable to give trouble in drying them than when they are well and vigorous. The weakly ones should, therefore, be carefully looked after. Some dairymen are in the habit of reducing the feed when they wish to stom the milk. If the animals were in high flesh and highly fed, this might do, but it is seldom advisable. Cows that have been milked a whole season usually become thin, and need an increase instead of a decrease of feed in the fall. It is much better to let the milking run a little longer and feed liberally than to pinch a cow. Excitement, worrying by dogs, the hurrying by noisy boys, kicking and pounding of an angry milker, or any similar treatment, will be sure to reduce the richness of milk several per cent.

Tracy Republican:—The feeling that Gen. W. D. Washburn should be sent to the United States senate in place of the present incumbent—Senator Sabin, is fast gaining ground among the people of Minnesota, especially is this so among the agricultural districts. Farmers recognize the value that the Soo road, of which Mr. Washburn is president, is to them in the already advanced price paid for wheat. We believe, that like the demand for Merriam for governor, by the agricultural district, so will the representatives from these same districts demand the election of Mr. Washburn for the United States senate. Already several counties, have shown themselves anti Sabin and declare themselves in favor of a clean, upright man of the people. Gen. Washburn is the staunchest kind of a republican from "way back" and whether in or out of office has always been true to party; no mugwump or free tradeism about him. It now looks as though he would be easily elected.

Hon. W. D. Washburn.

Moorhead Weekly News: The News has heretofore published matter in its nature biographical and in praise of Mr. Washburn as a man of integrity, business sagacity and statesmanship. Here is an item clipped from the Anoka Herald which shows him to have a heart full of sympathy for the misfortunes of humanity and a generosity of spirit which unlooses his purse-strings when calamities befall men. In short that he possesses all the finer feelings of a generous and sympathetic nature. It is not strange in view of the circumstances that many friends rise up at this time and declare for him for United State senator. Why should not such a man, possessing the business and legislative training, and the many good qualities which would adorn that high station be commissioned by the people to fill it?

"I want to tell you a story," continued my Meeker county friend, "that illustrates the kind of a man Washburn is. Until recently he owned a big farm in our county and in Kandiyohi. During the year of the drouth and grasshopper raid he was a heavy loser—the pests destroying at least $20,000 worth of his crops. He came up through the county to see the actual condition of things, and he found us in a bad plight. Many of us had lost our entire crops, and hadn't a thing to live on through the winter. He never said a word about his own loss, but he was full of sympathy for us. He didn't make many promises, but in a few days after he went home, he sent his neighbors up a big lot of provisions and clothing—thousands of dollars worth. He didn't make any blow about it, and but few people ever heard of his generosity. That is the kind of a man Mr. Washburn is. He ain't much on talking, but he is a regular steam engine for doing. And when they say he is rich and that is against him, I say give us more rich men, but give them the same kind of a heart that W. D. Washburn has."

Horses on the Farm.

Prof. A. J. Cook, in Rural New-Yorker.

It is no mistake to say that it costs little more to raise a horse to three years of age than it does to raise a cow or steer; and with the same care in selection, feeding and breeding we can find an eager market for our colt at from $150 to $200, while our cattle go begging for a market at less than one-half the sum. If these are facts—and I believe they are—it pays every farmer to give the mater earnest consideration.

First, as to selection. As the large draft horses find ready sale at high prices, are quiet, and so do not disturb fences, while they are easily handled and broken and in no wise tend to lead their owner or his boys to race courses or gambling, it goes without saying that they are the horse for the farmer to breed. I would always breed to a pure-bred male, if I could. To breed to a first-class Hambletonian costs from $35 to $100. To breed to a Percheron or a Shire costs but $20. If we breed to trotting stock and do not get a trotter our animals sell for little, if any—unless mares, for no more—than an ordinarily bred horse. Horses weighing from 1,000 to 1,100 pounds, unless fat, are not salable at a price beyond $150 at four or five years of age. The occasional horse that is fat, if bred by a farmer, usually carries his owner at a rapid gait to the bad. Thus in any case fast horses are not desirable for the farmer to own and breed. Again, trotters are really flyers, and so, usually, the best fence will not stay them, and, moreover, they are so restless that they will suffer only the very best and strongest fences to remain good any length of time. Besides all this, they are so spirited that they need a skilled horseman to break them, and a good horseman and harness ever afterward or they are not entirely safe.

By breeding draft horses this is changed. At three or four years of age, even a half or three-fourths blood Percheron will readily sell for $200, if from a good brood mare. Such animals are always quiet in the yard or field, are broken with no trouble and are easy and safe in the harness almost from the first. Last summer a three-year-old Percheron colt on our college grounds kicked in play and came down on the wrong side of the tongue of the wagon. He stopped at once and was put right. A Hambletonian would have made things lively just then. In penning the above I have given no fancy sketch. I have only spoken from my own experience. When I commenced on my farm I had some fine common mares. There was one of the finest studs of Hambletonian horses in the United States right at hand. I commenced breeding these trotters. I now have several beautiful colts; but they are fairly good roadsters, and I never expect to sell one of them for $200, although $35 was the first cost. Now I am working into Percherons, and I am persuaded that had I commenced with them, I should now be several hundreds of dollars better off. I prefer Percheron to Shire horses, as it seems to me they have better feet to to use in the cities, where our large sales are principally to be made.

My present plan is to keep only large, fine mares to do my farm work. Those that are half Percheron will do, though of course, those of three-fourths or seven-eighths blood would be better. Half of these mares are so bred tha they will foal somewhere between the middle of September and the middle of November. I prefer September or October. The others are bred so that they will foal in March or April. The first mares are well fed in winter, and by the time the spring work opens their colts are ready to be weaned, and as these colts can then be turned right on to good pastures, they usually catch up with the spring colts before they mature into horses. The mares are in good trim, and can do the heavy summer's work, like heavy plowing, etc. The spring bred mares have young colts, but are no worse on that account, if well fed, for doing the light farm work. We favor these all summer, giving them the "soft jobs;" while in fall they, in turn, do the heavy work with no harm to them or their colts, which, with good care, are now independent of their mothers.

I find this plan works exceedingly well, and with silage, which every progressive farmer will surely have, these fall colts will give the best satisfaction. At lest I am delighted with the plan, and shall continue to pursue it till someone suggests a better. These high grade Percherons are fine walkers, and to break them we only have to hitch them in at three years of age and go to working them. In a short time they will work as well as old, experienced horses. I would urge then: breed arge draft horses; use only full-blood mares; raise at least half the colts in the fall; and sell all males and superfluous females at from $200 to $250, and as much more as the would be owner will pay.

Wallace's Monthly: The draft horse is easily broken to harness and submits cheerfully to labor. The farmer has no need of a professional breaker to educate his horses to go in harness, for long years of patient service of ancestors has fixed in him the heredity to submit willingly to the obedience of man. There is no tedious process of breaking to undergo, and his easy temperment responds naturally to good feed, and he is quickly put in condition for the market. A ready market is constantly open to absorb the draft horse, so when the common farmer has a good individual of this breed has not long to wait for a buyer after he is conditioned for the market. The demand far exceeds the supply. The city of New York annually requires 14,000 of these animals to do her work. They are in demand in all the large cities, in the mines, in the lumber regions, and in all places where heavy loads are to be moved by horses. The common farmer who is stocked up with draft horses, of suitable weights to meet the demands of the market, can turn them into cash at their real value more quickly than any other class of horses.

Says the Northwestern Agriculturist: The lesson of the cattle market is still fair prices for good beef, but no profit for the farmer on the inferior article. The best beef is made only from cattle of good breeding to begin with, and liberal feeding to the day of market. The best bred cattle will not make good beef without liberal feeding, and the most liberal feeding will not make first-rate beef out of scrub cattle. The farmers of the Northwest cannot afford to compete with Texas cattle. To make a profit they must breed good beef cattle of the beef breeds, and keep them growing from calfhood by judicious but liberal feeding. With the cheap food which the Northwest has in abundance, there is good profit in growing the kind of beef which brings the highest price in the market.

Diversity of Crops.

Hutchinson Leader: Wheat may be a poor crop or a total failure, but it cannot bring a season of poverty and desolation on the average McLeod County farm as was the case a few years ago. Diversified farming has wrought a magical change; now there is corn, barley, potatoes, hay, poultry, butter, eggs, pork and beef to sell. Wheat is no longer king, with power to make or break, and we predict that the next ten years will advance our farmers in this respect ten times as far as have the past ten years. And the more intelligence we get on the farm, the more prosperity we find, and with it come happier homes, contented children and a recognition of the fact that farming is the most independent, peaceful, healthful, elevating and honorable avocation the world affords.

Live Stock in the Northwest.

Henry Dobson, in Western Rural, says: I was born and brought up and have always lived and farmed in Ohio. But I have traveled through Northern Minnesota, Dakota and Montrna, and am free to say that if I was not over fifty years of age, I would be on a section of land in the district you have seen, breeding pure bred stock, before another year. After a careful investigation of the claims of that country as a stock country, I cannot help concluding that it is the best country for stock that can be found under the sun. In the first place it costs next to nothing to feed stock there. They live and fatten upon the native grasses. In time it will cost more, of course, for the wild grasses will fail and the native grasses and grain feeding will take their place. But that will be years hence. But there is one thing that will never fail, and that is the grand pure atmosphere that the animals breathe. Much is written about the character of the air there, but nobody who has not breathed it can form any conception of it's tonic properties. If I should be asked where the greatest meat producing sections of the are to be, I should answer Minnesota, Dakota and Montana; and there are people now living who will, in my opinion, see it. All in the world that is wanted there is railroads, and where railroads now run intelligent stockmen will be quick to recognize the advantages of the location; and while in Dakota especially, it will not be said that the flocks will be seen upon a thousand hills, it will be said that flocks and herds by the thousands will be seen upon the millions of acres of fertile prairie.

Butter vs. Beef.

Waldo F. Brown, in N. Y. Tribune.

I think I can prove that the food required to make a pound of dressed beef will make a pound of butter. The average cattle of the country do not gain 500 pounds a year, and there are plenty of dairies that average more than 250 pounds of butter to the cow and some average 300 pounds. Now, the rule is two pounds of live weight to one pound of beef, and the cow that makes 250 pounds of butter in a year produces a weight equal to 500 pounds of cattle live weight, and this weight of beef will bring, at $4 per 100, $20, while the butter, at 20 cents a pound, will bring $50; and all my experience as a feeder and a dairyman goes to show that it is easier to get 20 cents a pound for butter than $4 per 100 for beef. In other words, 20 cents a pound for butter is equal to $10 per 100 live weight for beef. Is it not better even than this? Look at another fact: The farmer who will sell ten beeves a year must keep on hand thirty animals—ten yearlings, ten two-year-olds, and the ten he prepares for market, while the farmer with ten good cows can milk them ten years, or longer, if he gives them the care he ought. The income of the dairyman will be regular, giving him weekly cash to meet his expenses, while the man who looks to his beef cattle for his will wait a year for it. To be sure, he will not have so much milking and will not have to churn, but to offset this there will be enough income from the skimmilk and buttermilk to pay for this labor. If wisely fed in connection with other food, each ten to fifteen pounds of milk will make a pound of pork, and after raising the heifer calves you can make several dollars worth of pork to the cow before the year is out. I believe I have made a fair statement, but even if you reduce the butter to 200 pounds per cow there is still a good margin of profit when compared with beef at $4 per 100. I have put the price of butter at 20 cents, but there is no need of selling it for that if you make a first-class article, and if—as I believe you can—you get 25 cents or more, all the better.

The St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway Co. will run a series of cheap holiday excursions from points on their line in Minnesota, Dakota and Manitoba north of, and including, Grand Forks, Crookston, St. Johns, Devils Lake, Grafton, St. Vincent, Winnipeg, etc., etc., for which the very low rate of $40,00 for the round trip will apply to points in Eastern and Western Ontario and Quebec. Tickets will be issued Nov. 5th, 12th, 20th, 27th, and Dec. 3d, 11th, and 17th, limited to 90 days from date of sale and good for stop-over privileges.

A comparison of distances will show that the Manitoba is the shortest line by a great many miles between St. Paul and Minneapolis or Ontario and the principal points in Minnesota, Dakota and Manitoba from which these excursion rates apply.

For these special excursions the Manitoba will run dining cars, Palace Sleepers, free colonist cars and elegant day coaches. This is the only road to Manitoba, Minnesota and Dakota owning and controlling its own dining and sleeping cars, and furnishes a service which is not equalled by any line in the west.

For through tickets at the lowest rates to all parts of the Continent and full particulars regarding these excursions, call upon or write the nearest ticket agent of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Ry., C. H. Mix, agent, Crookston, or to F. I. Whitney, G. P. A., St. Paul. [28-34]

Northwestern Agriculturist: For soiling or early hay the best grasses are orchard grass and meadow oat grass sown in equal quantities. These mature much earlier than timothy and are good yielders. More attention to hay and pasture is being given by northwestern farmers, and results of experiments in sowing grasses last spring would make excellent reading for those who wish to seed down old ground next season. Transition from grain to grass must come with the introduction of live stock and raising it profitably, and it is important that the best grasses, their adoption to our soils, and the best way of seeding be generally discussed.

Cheap Excursions to Points East.

The Northern Pacific R. R. announce a series of seven special excursions from Grand Forks, Dak., to points in Eastern Canada and return during November and December.

Tickets will be on sale Nov. 5th, 12th, 20th, 27th, and December 3d, 11th and 17th.

The fare will be at the very low rate of $40 for the round trip; tickets are limited to ninety days from date of sale and good for stop over.

With the completion and opening of the new line through to Winnipeg the Northern Pacific R. R. offers the superior accommodations of dining cars and Pullman sleeping cars through on all trains between St. Paul and Winnipeg. We desire to call special attention to these accommodations as they are an entirely new departure to the traveling public of North Dakota. Bear in mind that no other line offers similar inducements, and, notwithstanding the attractions of fast time, through cars, Pullman sleeping cars and magnificent dining cars, via the Northern Pacific, the fare is always as low as via any other route.

For full information regarding routes, rates, etc., apply to the nearest ticket agent of the Northern Pacific R. R. W. E. Germaine, passenger and ticket agent Grand Forks, H. W. Nunn, agent, Grafton, F. J. Cunningham, agent, Pembina, or Chas. S. Fee, General Passenger and Ticket Agent, St. Paul. [26-34]

A Good Word from Fargo.

To the Editor of the Tribune.

Fargo, Dak., Nov. 23—As an old resident of Minneapolis and Fargo it is very gratifying to me to read of the high endorsement through the press of the Northwest that is being so well bestowed upon your most excellent and worthy citizen, the Hon. W. D. Washburn, in connection with his candidacy for the high and honorable position of United State senator. Well may not only the citizens of Minneapolis, but those of the entire Northwest, feel proud that they have such an able and honorable man to represent them in congress as Gen. W. D. Washburn, whose name alone is a tower of strength in every walk of life. Knowing him as I have for the past 20 years I am free to say I belive he stands today without a peer as a successful and honorable business man and statesman. No man within the borders of your state has ever undertaken so many great public enterprises and carried them through to such successful completion as W. D. Washburn. Surely not only does the citizens of your wonderful city, but those of the entire Northwest, owe him a debt of gratitude for his keen business foresight in the marvelous work of building the now famous Soo line from Minneapolis and St. Paul to the Sault Ste. Marie, a line that will in the near future be the great trunk line from the great wheat fields of the West to the seaboard of the East. If any doubts the wisdom of the building of the Soo line let him take a map and look at the position it holds and he must be convinced at once that it is one of the greatest factors in the interest of building up the great Northwest of any of the railroads of this country, and in that enterprise alone Gen. Washburn has not only proven himself a wise and sagacious business man but a public benefactor as well, and the people of the great North Star state will make no mistake in electing such a man as W. D. Washburn to represent them in the United States Senate, and I hope for the welfare of the state of my boyhood days, in whose prosperity I always have felt a deep interest, that they will honor themselves by honoring him, who has in the past so ably and worthily proved himself worthy of the confidence and esteem of the whole state regardless of political party, and the great republican party needs to keep in the council of the nation her ablest and greatest men and in Gen. Washburn we have an ideal republican. It is such as he that has given tone and dignity to the grand old party, which in the past the famous Washburn family have done so much to perpetuate. Only a few days since I heard a staunch Ohio war veteran say he wished Fargo had a few such men as Gen. Washburn to help build up her interests, and in the near future the Fargo people hope to see the general build a branch of his Minneapolis & Pacific line from Elbow Lake, Grant, county, Minn., to Fargo, which would then bring Fargo about 40 miles nearer by rail to Minneapolis than now. It would be an almost air line and would get lots of business from Fargo, and would, if built on northwest, tap a fine rich agricultural region, the great No. 1 hard wheat belt of North Dakota which is now well settled with an industrious, enterprising class of farmers, many of whom would be glad to see the Minneapolis & Pacific come into North Dakota in competition with the Northern Pacific and Manitoba railways.

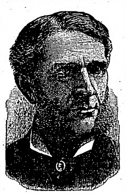
A FARGO PIONEER.

Col. Graves' Vote.

Duluth News: With the exception of one county, the vote of the Forty-sixth legislative district is in and has been counted. The total number of votes cast is 11,595. Of these Col. C. H. Graves, of Duluth, received 7,872; H. Hawkins, democrat, 3,232; Britts, prohibition, 498, with two votes for others. This gives Col. Graves a majority of 4,148, and a plurality of 4,640. This is undoubtedly very much the largest number of votes cast in any legislative district in the state, and Col. Graves, doubtless, also, has the largest majority of any man elected to the legislature in 1888. This is largely due to the colonel's high reputation as a public man and legislator, a reputation likely to result in his election to the speakership of the house.

St. Paul News: Col. C. H. Graves, candidate for speaker of the house, and one of the most prominent men in the northern portion of the state, is in the city looking up his interests. The colonel is making friends fast, and evidently has a good following. The report that he would go into the contest under the Sabin banner is denied by him. He is non-committal upon the senatorial subject. Mr. Graves favors a reapportionment this winter, and does not want to see any one speaker who does not.

SKETCH OF AN ACTIVE BUSINESS LIFE.



Hon. W. D. Washburn.

William Drew Washburn, of Minneapolis, was born at Livermore, Androscoggin County, Maine, January 14th, 1831; was reared on a farm, attending common school and fitting for college in winter and working on a farm in summer, until the age of twenty, graduating at Bowdoin college in 1854; read law the two succeeding years in the office of Hon. Israel Washburn, Jr., of Orono, and Hon. John A. Peters of Bangor, Maine; removed to the west and located in Minneapolis in 1857; was engaged in the practice of law and other pursuits until 1861, when he was appointed Surveyor General of Minnesota by president Lincoln, which office he held for four years, residing at St. Paul during that time. After the expiration of his term of office he returned to Minneapolis, and has since been engaged heartily in the different manufacturing industries in that city. He was the projector of the Minneapolis & St. Louis railway, and the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Salt Ste. Marie railway (the Soo route) and the Minneapolis & Pacific railway, and has been prominent in many other important enterprises for the development of the state. He was elected to the legislature of Minnesota in 1858 and 1871. He was elected to the 46th, 47th and 48th congresses, and declined a re-nomination for the fourth term. The Washburn family has been prominent in the politics of this country for nearly a century, and has furnished our history with governors of states, congressmen, diplomates and statesmen of high rank. W. D. Washburn is pre-eminently a business man, with a genius for organization and administration; a grasp of public affairs which gives him great influence all over the country; and a thorough knowledge of the needs of the people of Minnesota and the northwest which peculiarly fits him for a representative in the senate of the United States of this rapidly developing section of country. Mr. Washburn is personally affable and approachable to all classes of people, and his name stands for generosity and public enterprise. He is a thorough republican, and his record in his six years of congressional life is without a blemish.

Warren Sheaf: The state papers are now wrestling with the question: "Who will be our next Senator?" There are quite a number of names on the slate. Hon. W. D. Washburn seemes to be taking the lead with C. K. Davis and Knute Nelson closely following. It is to be hoped that, as the country has elected one of the ablest men in the United States as President, and the state has elected such an able set of representatives to the state legislature as well as other leading officers, there will be no mistake made on Senator. What we want is a man unbiased and without prejudices in favor of any particular locality but with the entire state at heart, one who cannot be bought or sold, such a man we believe Mr. Washburn to be,

St. Paul Globe: Col. C. H. Graves, who seems to have the call for the speakership of the next house, was about the lobby during the morning, and the earlier hours of the afternoon. Col. Graves talked freely, but declined to be committed upon the much mooted senatoral question. "The senatorship will no doubt go to a good man," said he, "but who, of course, I am unable to say. The senatorial contest frequently takes up too much time and retards other business. I am heartly in favor of reapportionment of the state. There are many sections of the state which are entitled to more of a representation than they have at present, and justice should be done them."

Northwestern Agriculturist: Every bushel of wheat, however inferior, is likely to be called for this year. When good milling wheat is scarce, the inferior grades find ready market; but in years of plentiful crops, the farmer whose wheat grades low can make more money by feeding it.

Scientific Miscellany.

A NEW FLORA.

The luxuriant vegetation of Krakatoa was totally destroyed by the eruption in 1883, not a living germ being left. Three years later the island was visited by Dr. M. Treub, who now reports having found six species of microscopic algae, which coated the rock and seemed to have formed the soil on which eleven species of ferns had taken root. A common grass of Java was growing, and there were quite a number of such species of flowering plants as first appear on coral islands. Seeds or fruit of several coral island trees were found on the shore. Krakatoa is ten miles from the Island of Siberie, containing the nearest terrestrial vegetation, twenty miles from Sumatra, and twenty-one from Java.

INTELLECTUAL INFLUENCE OF THE NOSE.

Aprosexie is the name Dr. Guye, of Amsterdam, chooses for inattentativeness, and he quite singularly finds that the nose is one cause of it. A dull boy became quick to learn after certain tumors had been taken from the nose; and a man who had been troubled with vertigo and buzzing in the ears for twelve years found mental labor easy after a like operation. In a third case, a medical student was similarly relieved. Dr. Guye supposes that these nasal troubles affects the brain by preventing the cerebral lymph from circulating freely.

BOILERS EXPLODED BY GAS.

After prolonged official investigation, the most extensive and complete destruction of steam boilers on record has been attributed to the sudden ignition of coal gas, mixed with air, that had accumulated in the flues. The explosion occurred July 25th 1887, in Upper Silesia, Germany, Twenty-two boilers, each with more than 1,000 square feet of heating surface, were instantly blown to pieces, buildings covering half an acre were destroyed, and three men were killed.

WASTE OF ENERGY.

In the ordinary sixteen candle power incandescent lamp, according to Prof. E. Merritt, only from four to six per cent of the energy actually expanded is available as light, the remainder being wasted as heat. To lessen this loss is one of the grestest electrical problems now awaiting solution.

FUTURE SCIENCE.

"What would one not give," asks Lubbock, "for a science primer of the next century? for, to paraphrase a well-known saying, even the boy at the plough will then know more of science than the wisest of philosophers do now."

DELICATE MEASUREMENT.

The new radio-micrometer of Mr. C. V. Boys—a thermo-electric circut suspended by a torsion fibre in a magnetic field—shows a temperature change of one ten-millionth of a centigrate degree.

A MECHANICAL NOVELTY.

The remarkable Mannesmann process of making seamless tubes is described by Mr. F. Siemens as consisting in passing the red-hot bar of solid metal or glass between revolving conoidal rollers. These rolls are so arranged that the varying velocities of revolution with which the different parts of the bar are brought into contact cause the formation of a hollow through the bar's centre. Tubes a foot in diameter, with a shell only a quarter of an inch thick, may be produced in this way, and great strength is claimed for them. Tubes with sealed ends may be made, the hollow centre being a vacuum.

HOMES OF ALL AGES.

An interesting feature of the Paris Exhibition will be a group of forty-nine structures intended to give a history of the human dwelling. The different types of shelters represented will include those of the prehistoric period—under rocks, in caves, on water and on land; and from later times those of early histroic civilization, of Aryan civilization, of Roman civilization in the east and in the west, and of rude civilizations disconnected from the general progress of humanity—the Chinese, Japanese, Eskimo, Aztec, etc. The interiors, the costumes of the occupants, and the surroundings, will be those of the different eposchs studied.

THE ELECTRIC AGE.

Prof. Elisha Gray remarks that electrical science has made a greater advance in the last twenty years than in all the 6,000 historic years preceding. More is discovered in one day now than in a thousand years of the middle ages. We find all sorts of work for electricity to do. We make it carry our messages, drive our engine, ring our door bell, and scare the burglar; we take it as a medicine, light our gas with it, see by it, hear from it, talk with it, and now we are beginning to teach it to write.

ONE YEAR CLOCKS.

An important improvement in clocks has been shown the British association for the advancement of science by Mr. W. H. Douglass. The new feature is the torsion pendulum, which, with lever and escapement, may be applied to ordinary works, and by its slow rate of vibration makes practicable the conversion of an eight-day clock into one requiring winding only once a year.

PHOTOGRAPHIC PROGRESS.

Among recent camera achievements is a portrait copy taken by the light of a Cuban fire-fly in thirty seconds, and a photograph of the aurora borealis. To obtain the latter had been declared an utter imposibility.

Sell Eggs by Weight.

Denver Field and Farm: Said an old market man to a newspaper reporter: "The correct way to buy and sell eggs is by weight. Number does not show their value, weight does. Some eggs weigh twice as much as others. What justice or business sagacity is there in paying the same price for one as for the other? Is not the farmer who sells a large egg for the same price that his neighbor sells a small one cheated? And is not the buyer of the small one cheated? Just as well might butter be sold by rolls, the small one bringing as much as the large one. People do sell butter by the number of pieces or cheese by number; nor should the dealer sell eggs by number. If eggs were bought and sold by weight, the value of certain breeds of fowls would be changed. Now the breed that furnishes the greatest number of eggs is the most profitable; then it would be the one that furnishes the greatest weight. Some breeds are remarkable for the smallness of their eggs; such breeds would necessarily suffer in popularity, the fowls that lay large eggs would gain.

Government Aid.

Northwestern Agriculturist: Our government has only just begun to recognize the value of experiments and scientific investigation to agriculture, and appropriations have been very moderate, thus far, to aid this mighty industry, which is the foundation of all others. And yet many years ago the first Napoleon appropriated 1,000,000 frances to encourage making sugar from beets in France, and, as a resule, the cost of producing a pound of the sugar was reduced from forty to less than three cents. In every country which has prospered, the government has encouraged this foundation industry by developing the resources of the soil in every possible way. In England, the annual agricultural products have been trebled within the last thirty years, by the knowledge of better methods which public and private enterprise has disseminated. In America the farmers have taken care of themselves, until recently without any practical schools of agriculture in the country. It is not too much to expect that the spread of valuable knowledge through the government and state experiment stations now being established, will result in largely increased average crops to the acre, and to an advancement all along the line in methods of farming.

Northfield News: Did you ever think that the position of a newspaper publisher might be a happier one if everybody could be made to see that he ought not to be forgotten. Let a farmer place himself in a similar position and see if he would do the same. Suppose he raised two thousand bushels of wheat and more, and his neighbor would come and buy a bushel, and the price was the small matter of one dollar and fifty cents or less, and the neighbor says: "I will hand you the money in a few days." As the farmer wants to be fair about the matter he says all right and the man leaves with the wheat. Another man comes in the same way until the whole of the two thousand bushels of wheat are trusted out to as many different persons and not one of the purchasers concerns himself about it for it is a small account he owes the farmer and of course that would not help the farmer. He does not realize that the farmer has fritted away all his crop of wheat and that its value is due him in two thousand little dribbles and that he might be seriously embarrassed in his business because his debtors treat it as a little matter. But if all would pay promptly, which they could do as well as not, it would be a very large amount to the farmer, and enable him to carry on the business without difficulty. This is the case with the newspaper man. Do you see the application?

Detroit Record: The election of an United States senator to succeed Senator Sabin is now agitating the minds of Minnesotians considerably, and that public sentiment favorable to the election of Hon. W. D. Washburn, of Minneapolis, is rapidly crystalizing there can be no doubt. While Sabin gives it out that he is in the field to stay until the die is cast, it is very doubtful if he can secure anything like the requisite number of votes to secure his re-election. No action of Senator Sabin, during his six years of service, has been of a character to awaken public enthusiasm in his behalf, and while he may appear as one of the leading candidates, his re-election is not looked for. On the other hand the mere mention of the name of W. D. Washburn was sufficient to cause all other applicants to quake with fear, and to call forth such hearty endorsement from the press of the state as is seldom witnessed. In Mr. Washburn is recognized a man of great ability and wide influence. He is an acknowledged leader among men, thoroughly conversant with the needs of the people of his state, public spirited, and a thorough republican. With both Davis and Wasbburn in the U. S. senate Minnesota might well feel proud of her representatives in that body.

Northwestern Agriculturist: Many farmers who have storage of their own, are selling their frosted wheat by sample at much better prices than they get from local elevator men who are timid about grading it as it is not yet certain how it will stand in the market. Millers who buy from sample, know just what it is worth, and are willing to pay a fair price, especially as fair milling wheat is scarce and likely to advance very rapidly in price, as soon as the real condition of the crop is known. It is said that frosted wheat is much better for milling purposes than its appearance indicates.

Bro. Stevens, of the Warren Register, gave us a pleasant call on Monday. He thinks (and justly) that the Red River Valley has strong claims for the U. S. Senatorship. This is true, but then, you know, Bro. Stevens, we havn't got the "inflooence" necessary to secure it. If we had our just representation we could sail in and capture the bakery, without a doubt. One thing we should insist upon at the coming session of the legislature and that is re-apportionment. There is no doubt but what we can get it if we try.

Paste this prediction in your hat; that W. R. MERRIAM will be the Governor of Minnesota, and that there will be no "power behind the throne," and further that he will rank among the very best that any state in the Union ever had. No "fine Italian hand" will play that harp!

Mr. Mel. Milne and Miss Minnie Ayers caused a decided sensation in the Quaker duett "Dos't Thou Love Me, Sister Ruth?" Last spring the young man could not begun to have sustained his part so gracefully, but he spent the summer in this office, graduating with honor this fall, hence those graceful poses and striking attitudes. It takes a "typo" to be a thoroughbred dude naturally.

Moorhead seems to be on the boom for educational facilities. The new State Normal school there has 75 students and Hope academy 70. Both institutions are well equipped with all of the modern appliances and the best talent to be had for instructors. The Normal school has been a grand success from the start and will prove a valuable acquisition to the institutions of the Northwest.

Tom Adams says he has heard from his better half who is "way down upon the Swanee Ribber," far, far away in Tennessee, and that she is homesick! He says her "homesick" ain't a patchin' to his, and if ever he consents again to keep house all alone it will be some time so far in the dim future that he can't conceive of it. Says it is not what it is cracked up to be, and he will have no more of it if he knows himself.

The Pioneer Press made the statement that "T. A. Dunlava has been appointed receiver in place of Louis K. Aaker, who, not wishing to play hog, had resigned," &c., &c. Well, the facts in the case are that Mr. Lars K. Aaker tendered his resignation over two years ago, but it was never accepted until after the election. While there is no doubt that Mr. Dunlava would make a good official enough, it strikes us that under existing circumstances the appointee should be a Norwegian, or should understand that language, at least, as by far the larger proportion of the patrons of the Land Office are of Norwegian birth, and very many cannot talk English at all. Mr. Aaker has been a capable and efficient official, and, should he desire it, should be retained.

VALLEY ROLLER MILLS.

A leading citizen suggests to THE JOURNAL that the long winter hours could well be employed by our citizens in looking up manufacturing interests and in devising ways and means for their estalishment in our midst. That is very true, and we do not know until we try, how much good could be accomplished in that way. If we had a dozen or so large manufactories in our midst the effect would be more than magical. There are many such establishments in the East seeking a better location, and if we could secure two or three of them by spring it would be a winter well spent. Let us go to work unitedly and harmoniously and see what we can do. We certainly can accomplish nothing unless we try, and there is an abundance of energy here to accomplish great results. Suppose we try it, anyhow.

In reply to a letter from Auditor George, of Norman County, in relation to seed wheat for the needy, Governor elect, W. R. Merriam, writes the auditor to ascertain how many persons will need assistance and to report the same by the time the Legislature convenes. His prompt and ready sympathy proves what his friends have all along claimed for him, that W. R. Merriam is emphatically the friend of the farmer. His every action in public life has shown this to be true, and the frantic efforts of monopolists and spoilsmen to defeat him in the last campaign proved that he was not the kind of a man they could use in their business. The farmers of Minnesota nominated W. R. Merriam and they elected him Governor, and he will make a record that will make them bless the day he was made Governor.

Ye Old Folkses Concert.

In McKinnon's Hall on Tuesday evening was well attended and a very enjoyable entertainment. The clock in ye old town hall had scarcely struck ye hour of eight when the hall door swung wide to admit "Old Father Time" who marshalled in such a host of men and women singers, rigged in all the finery of ye ancient time such as is seldom seen by a fashionable Crookston audience. Such costumes would set the modern modiste crazy and such opera hats! The modern opera fiend would go wild with envy; (and one lady milliner was like to faint.) Such a host as took possession of that stage would require hours of time and columns of space to describe and we must content ourself with a feeble (and wholly futile) attempt. The A. B. C. duet was excellently well rendered by Mr. and Mrs. J. O. Milne. Miss Mamie Milne made a decided hit "Comin' thro' the rye!" Next, John Bailey, as "Old Father Time" was struck with a "complaint" which, though he failed to name, we took to be a Waterbury watch, tho' that could hardly have been "when George the Third was King," for they wasn't built that way in those days. "Within a mile of Edinboro town," Miss Minnie Ayers sang in a manner that just made us wish we were no further away from that same town just then. She was encored to the echo and could not escape a repetition. "Peter Grey," as produced by John Bailey, Mel. Milne, J. W. Wheeler and Dr. Robertson threw the house into convulsions of laughter which all of the seriousness of the closing "hime" could not overcome. It furnished market for many suppers that otherwise would doubtless not have been needed. Mind you we are not attempting to describe this concert in its entirety. We do not know as we would if we could because if you did not hear it you should have done so as it only cost "two shillings" and was easily worth "four bits" so you are out just twenty-five cents and the description. It must suffice for us to say that as a whole it was excellent and highly appreciated.

Sunday School Institute.

The Sunday School Institute convened on Friday evening in the M. E. church, with Rev. Mr. Herrick, of Montevideo, at the helm. The session was a good one and a general interest was established which existed throughout the meetings.

Saturday afternoon, in the Congregational church, a childrens' meeting was held, conducted by Mr. Nesbitt, Secretary of the State Sunday School Association, which was followed by a meeting of Sunday School workers of the city, and a discussion of methods of work ensued. In the evening, at the same place, a meeting for the suggestion of plans for working of a model Sunday school, was held. Messrs. Nesbitt, Herrick, Medlar, Wheeler and Boree taking a prominent part.

At 3 o'clock Sunday afternoon a childrens' mass meeting was held in the Baptist church, which was largely attended. Mr. Nesbitt presided, assisted by Mr. Herrick. Spirited singing and earnest talks, accompanied by blackboard work, characterized the service, which was followed by a meeting of the young peoples' societies of the city, presided over by Mr. Nesbitt, who gave much timely advice concerning methods of work for the societies named.

At 7 p.m. a mass meeting was held, which crowded the Baptist church to its utmost capacity. Rev. Mr. Herrick made a brief but eloquent address, which was highly appreciated. Mr. Nesbitt followed with instructions and suggestions to Sunday school superintendents and teachers, and then came one of the most inspiring song services ever held in the city, which made the meeting one long to be remembered by all who were present.

At the close of this service a county Sunday school association was organized with the following persons as officers:

President—J. W. Wheeler.
Secretary—Melville Milne.
Treasurer—Fred Mix.
Vice Presidents—J. P. Marcum, S. M. McKee, J. N. Bailey, Mr. Boree, Henry Peterson, Frank Brown.

Senior Vice Commander—C. S. Spendley.
Junior Vice Commander—Wm. Kistenmacher.
Surgeon—Dr. L. S. Stowe.

Warren Register: It is feared that unless the rapid-transit-palace-horse-car-vestibuled-train-with-cow-catcher-attachments, that is now pounding time between Crookston and St. Vincent, is pulled off soon, there will be nothing left of the road except the road-bed and a streak of rust, as the wear and tear upon the rails, by such cyclonic speed as is made by this on-rushing train of "day coaches," with horse-car accommodations, must soon leave them a otal wreck.

Beltrami Telangraphs.

BELTRAMI, Dec. 6, 1888.

If the prohibitionists wish to realize who are the real friends of temperance all they will have to do is to ponder over the vote of Reis township on Nov. 6th. The vote stood: Harrison 30, Fisk 13, Cleveland 9. Can any honest prohibitionist say that Beltrami would be (and it has been for two years) a temperance town were it not for the republicans, and what is true in this town is true in nearly all the places that have a republican majority. The great mass of the party are always glad to aid the temperance cause. When it is impossible to abolish the infernal traffic they limit it by all the means in their power. Were you a member of the church and there were some bad men in it, would you, as christians, do all in your power to destroy it. No, you would remain in the church and try to convert or drive the bad ones out. Now, the republican party has been, and is, the party of noble ideas and principles, and there is no more sense in trying to destroy it because there are a few saloon keepers and a few who are working for the saloon interest (many drinkers would vote against saloons) than there would be in trying to destroy the church. Read what Rev. Sam. Small says regarding the serious injury to the temperance cause by the prohibitionists of the State of New York, and return to the party who have always been your friend and we will work together for freedom, justice, temperance, purity and truth.

The Rev. Sam Small aroused a hornet's nest among the Temperance Union people in New York on Saturday. Mr. Small's remarks have a force and influence by no means commensurate with his unpretentious name, and his thrusts strike home to the party, which is a little inclined to regret the party action by which it helped elect a democratic governor of New York and a democratic legislature in New Jersey, both of which are heart and soul pledged to uphold the liquor interests. Mr. Small spoke volumes of wisdom to his party when he said:

"We prohibitionists have held the balance of power in fifty-two congressional districts, and we might have used our power to have men put into office favorable to prohibition. But the prohibition party has constantly run independent tickets, instead of joining with some other party, and as a consequence we hane no representation. We have also held the balance of power in several of the states, but we have lost our opportunity because we have placed party above principle."

But he condensed the real essence of the temperance question into one pithy sentence when he asserted that "It is better that the saloon should go than that a prohibition party should come." If the prohibition party care anything for the accomplishment of their principles it is time for them to cease aiding the very party and principle which they are ostensibly trying to destroy.

"My little brother," said the boy. Crookston some time ago voted $50,000 to brother Hill, and she is now in the same condition as the little boy, she "got left." I suppose Hill is the same as all the leading democrats—say one thing and do another.

Mentor Items.

MENTOR, Minn., Dec. 10, 1888.

Since our enterprising merchant, Harry Attix, has left town, "Mentor Items" have been a little shy.

Moe & Buhn have moved their stock and building from Old Mentor to the new townsite and are prepared to do justice to all their old and new customers.

It is rumored that the St. P., M. & M. R. R. Co. are going to put a daily train on this branch. Everybody hopes it is not a false report, for, as trains are now running, we have to stop two nights in the big city.

The little daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Van Tuyl is very sick with diphtheria.

Mentor now boasts of two as good elevators as there are on this branch, with a capacity of 40,000 bushels each, and if they are too large for this crop, they will not be for an ordinary year. The Minneapolis & Northern is run by R. Barker, of Argyle, and the Red River Valley by E. A. Fisk, an old resident of Crookston, but who has been buying wheat for the same company in Dakota for the past two years.

Everybody that has wood to haul is praying for the "beautiful snow," and as soon as the sleighing is good there will be thousands of cords of wood shipped from this station. Your correspondent learns that E. D. Childs & Co. intend to cut from 1,000 to 1,500 cords; also that Stone & Taylor have men on the ground now who are chopping as fast as possible.

MORTGAGE SALE.

[First publication Dec. 6th, 1888.]

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of two hundred and eleven dollars and sixty cents, ($211.60,) principal and interest, due and which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by Emeline Henion, a widow, to Smith W. Fisk, bearing date the twelfth day of March A. D. 1887, and duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the eighteenth day of March A. D. 1887, at 11 o'clock and twenty-five minutes a. m., in book "29" of mortgages on pages 318 and 319, said mortgage was made to secure the payment of a promissory note of even date therewith, for the sum of two hundred dollars ($200.00,) payable on or before one year from the date thereof, made by said Emeline Henion, payable to said Smith W. Fisk or order and delivered by said mortgagor to said mortgagee at the date thereof, and whereas, the power of sale in said mortgage contained has become operative, and no action or proceedings at law or otherwise has been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, and the premises described in and covered by said mortgage, viz: Lots ten ((10,) twelve (12) and fourteen (14,) in block three 3,) in Grand Forks East, according to the recorded plat thereof on file, and of record in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for said County of Polk and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances, said premises being situate in said County of Polk, will be sold at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest and ten dollars attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the costs and disbursements allowed by law, which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said County of Polk, at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said county and state, on the first day of February A. D. 1889, at 10 o'clock a. m., of that day, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

The case of the State vs. James Payton, charged with assault in the first degree, come on for trial on Monday and was given to the jury about 4 o'clock on Tuesday. This was the case of the shooting of Chief of Police Hayes which is still fresh in the minds of our readers. Hon. H. Steenerson was appointed to defend the prisoner and set up the plea of insanity. The case was ably prosecuted by County Attorney Ives, and the defense got up quite a boom in the insanity line, trying very hard to make it apply in this case. Attorney Steenerson made a very strong plea, and then the Judge charged the jury in a brief, common sense way which showed very clearly what their duty was in the premises. The verdict rendered was "guilty as charged."

We apologize, and will say by way of explanation, that the visitors from Warren failed to find the aforesaid "members" of that committee, and that we stated in the article to which Bro. A COMPANY OF THREE.

"Two's company, three's none."—Old proverb.

CHAPTER I.—A MAN'S WILL.

Lumley, the well-known auctioneer, and his friend Wybert Moss, were talking about John Pawson, and they agreed that he was one of the best men in Swarfton, and they rejoiced at his prosperity in life.

"He has nothing to trouble him," said Lumley.

"And plenty of money," replied Moss, "which is more than I can say about myself."

"The same old tale," was Lumley's laughing answer, and he hurried away.

But John Pawson had a good deal to trouble him just then, as he often said to himself when he was alone, for he had formed the habit of speaking his thoughts, and sometimes did so even in company.

He entered Burtonford's bank when he was a boy, and was always a favorite with the late Mr. Anthony Burtonford. Nobody was surprised when John Pawson became a partner; it was in accordance with the fitness of things. But what surprised the public was that Eric Burtonford, the banker's nephew, was sent adrift.

"I would rather be a customer at the bank than a clerk there," was what Lumley said to Wybert Moss. "Old Burtonford is not the best man in the world to get on with. His temper is all thick and thin. His good qualities are in great lumps; but, before you know where you are, he is raging and storming like all that." Wybert Moss said that he knew very little about bankers, but he would take his informant's word for it.

"Always trust the auctioneer," said Lumley.

"Certainly," replied Wybert. "I will trust him with my debts, if he will take charge of them."

Then there was a laugh, and the two parted.

The genera opinion in Swarfton was that Anthony Burtonford had quarreled with his nephew, and that the uncle's temper and Eric's pride had been both to blame. But Eric went away from Swarfton, and did not return even when Mrs. Burtonford, the banker's wife, died.

"Eric's in London painting pictures," said the gossips, "and he ought to have come to the funeral, though he is not own nephew to Mrs. Burtonford; but if uncle's wife is not kinship enough the world is coming to a pretty state."

So Eric was blamed for his omission of duty. But the banker said nothing. He never mentioned his nephew's name, and never allowed anybody else to do so in his hearing. It was usually thought, however, that John Pawson was an exception to this rule, and the conjecture was right; he knew why Eric had been sent away, and why he did not appear at the funeral.

Then Mr. Burtonford died very suddenly, and rumor was busy again. Eric would be sure to come this time, and he would remain at Swarfton and take his Uncle's place at the bank. Picture painting was all very well in its way, but it was not reasonable to suppose that it could ever be permitted to interfere with a bank. Moreover, there was Edith Markham, the late Mrs. Burtonford's niece. Everybody had always said Edith and Eric were intended for each other, and everybody felt that it would be a great shame if the general expectation were thwarted.

But the funeral took place and Eric was not there.

Then by degrees the truth leaked out about the banker's will. Popular feeling became divided at once.

"Eric Burtonford is no good," said the spokesmen of one party. "There is something under the surface which we have never seen. His uncle has not left him a brass farthing. Why the worst case I ever heard of before was not as bad as that. To be cut off with a shilling is rather stiff, but to be cut off without anything beats the record in this kind of business. The banker has left all he had to Edith Markham, but if ever she looks at Eric, or speaks to him, she is to lose her fortune."

"You are partly correct," said the spokeswoman on the other side of public opinion. "Some of your facts are wrong, and your inferences are completely so. We all know that Mr. Burtonford was passionate and headstrong. My opinion is that Eric only said his soul was his own. But the will does not declare that Edith is to lose her fortune if she speaks to Eric; she is not to do so without the consent of John Pawson."

Perhaps it is true that rumor is seldom altogether wrong, and never altogether right. The will of the banker was that, after certain legacies had been paid, including a large one to John Pawson, the residue should be held in trust for Edith Markham. But there was this strange condition in the will. If Edith, during the time that she remained unmarried, had any interview or held any communication with Eric Burtonford, except with the consent and in the presence of John Pawson, she should forfeit her share of the property, and it should be held in trust for Robert Lumley, auctioneer, and Wybert Moss, of no particular calling. "I have no liking for these men, but they are both keen enough to look well after their own interests. I cast no reflection upon John Pawson, but I would rather not leave him the task of disinheriting my wife's neice, should there be need for it." So said the banker.

Mr. Burtonford had written his own will, but it was properly signed and witnessed, and was perfectly legal in spite of many strange remarks and unlawyerlike phrases.

Both Lumley and Moss knew about the banker's use of their names, and often wondered whether they would benefit by this eccentricity, or remain always mere watchers, waiting to see if the course of events would produce any change to the attitude of Edith and Eric toward each other. As far as they knew, Eric had not been near Swarfton, and Edith had not seen him anywhere else. Sometimes they asked John Pawson about the affair, and he always answered in his calm, serious manner, that the provisions of Mr. Burtonford's will would be strictly carried out, but, as far as he knew, nothing had happened which called for interference.

"John Pawson will do the square thing," said Lumley to Moss. "My fear is that those two did not care as much for each other as people said."

"It is awkward," replied Moss. "As a rule, a will like Burtonford's would kindle love where it never before existed. There is nothing like opposition for strengthening affection. But as usual, the one exception to the rule keeps me poor."

* * * * * * * * *

John Pawson often talked to himself about Eric and Edith. He had known them since they were children, and had believed that their fondness for each other would ripen into true and lasting love.

"I know that Mr. Burtonford would have been pleased if he thought that Edith cared for me," John murmured with a blush, "but that is impossible. I supposed she liked Eric very much, and yet she never mentioned him. He was fond of her too, and yet he has kept aloof. I sent him word about his uncle's will, and he acknowledged my letter in a very manly way, but I have heard nothing since. He has been badly treated if he was innocent; yet I cannot see any explanation of the affair, unless he took the notes."

Then he reviewed again, for the hundredth time, what the banker had told him about the quarrel with Eric.

"I was in my library at home, John, and I had ten notes on the table; three were £50 notes, and the other seven were £10 notes. I wanted them for a particular purpose. I had just finished entering the numbers in my diary, when Eric came in. I told him to sit down, for I was busy. I wrote up my diary; then I was wanted in the drawing-room for a minute. I just glanced over the table, and left everything as it was. Perhaps I was absent five minutes. When I returned I found Eric seated where I had left him. Then I wrote a letter and took up the notes to inclose them. It was a private affair, John. I took up the notes, and the three fifties were missing. Eric declared that nobody had entered the room during my absence, and that he had not moved from the chair. I am sure nobody had been in but myself between the time when I entered the numbers and the time when I went to the drawing-room. No window was open, and there was not a fire. I told him he must turn out his pockets, and he refused point blank. Then there was a scene. I sent for Edith and told everything to her. Again I asked him to turn out his pockets, but he still refused. So I ordered him out of the house and told him never to show his face in Swarfton again, or I would give him in charge of the police. I am glad I always made it clear to him and Edith that there must be no billing and cooing between them. Edith is too good for him. What a wife she will make, John, in a few years! She is young yet, I know, but if she had a husband of steadiness and experience—a man like you—it would not matter. I am glad there was no billing and cooing between her and Eric."

John Pawson had his doubts about the banker's surmise respecting what he called billing and cooing. Edith lived with the Burtonfords, and had lived with them all her life. Eric lived with a married sister, whose husband was an artist. He was three years older than Edith, and was just 21 when his disgrace came upon him.

"These young people cared more for each other than Burtonford thought," said John Pawson to himself. "Has the trouble killed their love, or are they waiting for better times? I do not see where the better times are to come from unless every thing about these notes are cleared up. Could Mr. Burtonford be mistaken? The only time he ever spoke harshly to me was when I suggested that."

Thus John Pawson has reviewed the matter hundreds of times, but his perplexity remained. Then, two years after the banker's death, he received a letter from Edith, who was staying with some friends in Scotland, and who wrote asking that he would arrange for her to meet Eric, as she could clear up the mystery which had preplexed them so long. She said:

"Tell Eric when you write to him, please, that everything can be explained. Let me know when the interview is to be, and where. I wish to observe the conditions which my dear uncle laid down, but Eric must not remain under unjust suspicion any longer."

It was an embarrassing position for John Pawson. He wished Edith had been more explicit. From what he knew about her he did not think she was likely to raise hopes which would not be fulfilled. But how could she explain anything?

He wrote to Eric as Edith had desired, and received a prompt reply by telegraph saying, that he should be in Swarfton that night. Eric saw John Pawson; but John could not explain anything.

"We must wait till Edith comes, Eric," he said, "and you must not see her except in my presence. Lumley and Moss will not miss a chance."

Eric consented. He met Lumley and Moss the next day, and these two worthies seemed afterward to be in better spirits than usual.

"To be or not to be?" said Lumley.

"That's the question," replied Moss.

CHAPTER II.—A WOMAN'S WAY.

Edith Markham could not remember either her father or mother. Her mother was dead and her father was married again and lived abroad. That was all the information vouchsafed her.

Among Mr. Burtonford's papers was one which was addressed to Edith, in the banker's handwriting, with this instruction: "To be given to her at my death, but if that should happen before she is 21 she must keep this without opening it until that time. It is about her mother and father, and she need be in no hurry to learn the particulars."

She was 19 when her uncle died, and the executors—John Pawson and and Bardsley, the solicitor—gave the papers to her, according to the instructions which the dead had left.

"There is a good deal of writing there," said John. "Would you like to keep it, or shall I take care of it for you until you are 21?"

Edith thanked him, but kept it herself. The strange misfortune which had happened to Eric, and the death of her aunt, then the death of her uncle, had crushed her spirit. She could not help wondering whether her mother had been also unhappy. But she placed the paper in her desk and gave herself over to sad thoughts. When would the mystery concerning Eric be cleared up? Cleared up it must be, she felt sure. Then she read a note from him which he had sent to her at the time of the trouble:

> My dear Edith: There is a terrible mistake somewhere, but my uncle is sure to discover it, and he will be very sorry. I might have turned out my pockets to pacify him, but I had all your sweet little letters with me, and he would have recognized the writing. That would have made him very angry. I shall go to London, to Radburn's, and try what I can do at painting. My sister Rose will hear from me constantly. Ever your own. ERIC.

Radburn was an artist. He had often spoken encouraging words to Eric and tried to prevail on him to give himself up to art.

The years passed away and Edith did not see Eric. The discovery which was to clear him had not been made. Still, Edith did not doubt him. From Rose she heard about his welfare, and that was all. She set herself to wonder and to wait. If Eric had presented himself she would have risked the loss of fortune, but he kept silent and aloof; so she could only shut up her sorrow in her heart and pray for patience to endure it. She kept in the old house and had for a companion the widow of a clergyman, whom John Pawson recommended.

But Edith spent her 21st birthday in Scotland, and it was immediately afterward that she wrote the letter asking for an interview with Eric.

During these three years Eric had worked hard in London, and his friends spoke favorably of his chances in the keen competition of art. He told Radburn about his quarrel with his uncle and the cause of it, and enjoyed the sympathy of a true friend. But this Eric was not the Eric of yore. He had a sad look, and went about the work of life as if his heart was broken. His uncle's cruel will was a sad blow to him, and he resolved that unless his name was cleared he would not see Edith again. He never forgot her birthday. His sister Rose had written to say that she was away, and he was wondering where in Scotland she was visiting, and what kind of a birthday she had spent, when John Pawson's letter came. It was like the sight of the journey's end to a weary pilgrim. Eric did not realize before how much he had been suffering, and for the first time since his sorrow he wept bitterly.

* * * * * * * *

The interview was to take place in John Pawson's private room at the bank. Eric was there long before the time appointed, and the two men chatted about various subjects until Edith came. It was a strange meeting for these two, who had not seen each other for three years. John Pawson could not help watching them, and he saw the light of love in their eyes and knew what the end would be, whether the proofs were satisfactory or not.

"Now for business," said John, placing a chair for Edith by the side of his table and seating himself. Eric sat near to her and gazed wistfully into her face.

"First of all, can you tell me the numbers of those notes which disappeared?" Edith asked.

"Certainly," was John's reply. "I have had the book brought in on purpose, and here it is, opened at the right place." He referred to the open page, and told her the numbers.

Then Edith opened a small satchel which she had brought with her, and took from it two packets. The men watched her with breathlsss attention; but she calmly placed the satchel on the ground beside her, and then laid the larger packet on the table. It was a roll of manuscript, tied with strings. The other packet she opened and produced three bank notes.

"These are three notes for £50 each," she said, "and the numbers are the same."

"Where did you find them?" John and Eric asked together.

"Inside that roll of manuscript," she replied.

"What manucript is it?" John Pawson asked.

"It is the paper which my uncle left for me," said Edith, "and which I was not to open until I had reached the age of 21. It was written by my mother, but toward the end there are several pages which my uncle added. My mother was not happy. I think from what I have read there, that my uncle loved her very much at one time; but she preferred my father, and married him. She did not live long, but died when I was a baby. Then my father married somebody else, and I am afraid he received a considerable amount of money from my uncle. But he died three years ago, though I did not know it at the time. The very day when Eric's trouble came my uncle received news of my father's death and an abusive letter from the widow saying that his debts amounted to £220; and she said my uncle must send that sum, and send it in notes, not by check or draft. My uncle wrote: 'This shall be my last communication with a proud and extravagant woman. She shall have the money, and then good-by. This is intended only for your eye, Edith.'"

She did not say that her uncle also begged her to be warned by her mother's fate and not allow her affections to be won by any young fellow who cared a great deal more about pictures than about business; but she was to value at their true worth the qualities of a noble and honerable man, who never failed to do his duty, though the man might not have youth on his side.

"How came the bank notes in here?" Eric said, like a man who could scarcely believe his senses.

John Pawson was examining the notes. "They have been gummed or pasted to something," he remarked.

"Yes," replied Edith; "they were stuck to the back of one of these sheets." Then she opened the roll and showed where she had discovered them.

"This is my theory," she continued: "My uncle gummed the letter he had received and fastened it to the last sheet. Here it is. Some of the gum must have dropped on the back of the other sheet, and then it must have come in contact with the notes, and three of them adhered, without him being aware of it. He was agitated and angry at the time, and the manuscript was never opened again, for the date on the corner is that same day when Eric's trouble came."

No other explanation suggested itself, or was necessary, but the notes and papers were examined time after time.

"Thank God for this great mercy!" said Eric.

"Amen!" replied John Pawson, devoutly. Edith was silent, but the tears were falling down her cheeks.

Eric kissed her again and again.

John Pawson busied himself with the notes, and there was no atom of jealousy about him.

"They must marry at once," he said aloud; then he checked himself and looked toward the lovers to see whether they had heard him or not.

Yes, they had heard him, there was no doubt about that, so he made a clean breast of it and said:

"This makes no difference to the will. You must not see each other before the marriage except in my company or your uncle's fortune will be lost. Lumley and Moss will be on the lookout, I know. I have often wondered what people say to each other when they are lovers, and fate has ordered it so that I shall have to know; but you must bear my presence as well as you can, and for all our sakes made your wooing short."

"We must not tax John Pawson's patience too much, must we, Edith?" was what Eric said, taking her hand in his; then he whispered something more.

Edith whispered something in reply, and then Eric told John that he must bear with them awhile, but they would not trouble him long.

Robert Lumley and Wybert Moss were present when Edith and Eric were married. John Pawson gave the bride away, and Radburn had come from London to be Eric's best man.

"That's all over," said Lumley. "It must have been a queer courtship. John Pawson was with them every time they met. A decent man is John, but not the one I should pick to be with me if I was sweethearting."

"One's as good as another," replied Moss, dolefully. "I feel thousands of pounds poorer than I did."

"Going?" said Lumley.

"Going," replied Moss.

"Gone!" they both exclaimed, and there was not a smile between them.
—Cassell's Magazine.

Mr. and Mrs. Bowser,

From the Detroit Free Press.

It makes me tired when I sit and reflect on the courtship that made me change my name to Mrs. Bowser. I was full of love and trust and romance, and I looked upon Mr. Bowser as a god. One of his favorite pastimes was to place me where the lamp light fell upon my hair and to address me as his golden-haired angel. Poor silly girl that I was, I thought it would always last. One evening after we had been married five or six weeks, I took my stand under the gas and asked him if his angel was as dear to him as ever.

"Humph!" he growled, as he looked me over.

"But won't you praise my golden hair?"

"Golden carrots, Mrs. Bowser! If I had such a mop of carroty hair on my head as you possess I'd go hide it away in a barrel!"

"Then you have ceased to love me?"

"Ceased nothing! I have simply got tired of this boshy nonsense and I propose to settle down to the realities of life."

During our courtship Mr. Bowser delighted to read to me from a book of poems, and he insisted on holding one of my hands while he read. The second evening we were in our own house I brought out Longfellow and sat down beside him and took his hand.

"What are you pawing around for?" he asked, as he looked up.

"I want my deary to read to me."

"Well your deary has got something else to do. I'm reading up on bread and butter instead of poetry. Please keep your paw at home."

"You used to read such lovely poetry to me."

"That was because I was a fool."

I went over to the other side of the room and cried, and he let me weep away for a straight hour by the clock before he observed:

"Now, Mrs. Bowser, if you have got through sniveling we will go down stairs and measure that coal bin and figure up the cubic feet!"

During our courtship we used to take long walks in the gloaming, and though I was often so tired that I could hardly drag one leg after another, Mr. Bowser would insist on dragging me around. He was always quoting something about "glorious Luna" and "silver stars" and "heaven's arch," and one night as we sat upon the doorstep he put his arm around me and said he could sit there forever and aye. It was hardly a month after marriage that I put on my hat one evening and asked him if he didn't want to wander out for a while and watch the silent night shut down.

"I'd like to see myself sloshing around with this infernal corn on my toe!" he replied.

"Mr. Bowser, there was a time when you'd have walked all night with a corn on every toe."

"That shows what an idiot a man can make of himself."

"You once said that we'd always walk hand-in-hand in life's gloaming."

"I don't believe it! I knew I was soft, but I don't believe I was as mushy as that."

"But you certainly did."

"Well, I'll take it all back now. We've got something else to do besides squeezing paws and sighing about the gloaming, Mrs. Bowser! The whole caboodle of it wouldn't buy a peck of potatoes! It would look more sensible for you to wander out into the kitchen and see how many tramps the cook is feeding at my expense.

Lessep's Visit to Berlin.

From Paris Dispatch to the New York Courier des Etats Unis.

I saw, with other newspaper men, M. de Lesseps, who consented to give us an exact account of the thoroughly-reassuring result of his journey to Berlin and his interviews with Emperor William and Prince Bismarck. "It is peace, gentlemen," said M. de Lesseps, as he told us, with his customary good humor, of the incidents of his journey. What Emperor William said to him is almost literally as follows: "I am opposed to war, and I will not fight if I am not attacked. My son shares my views on this point. Your presence at Berlin causes me great pleasure. It allows me to express to a Frenchman, who enjoys the esteem of all nationalities—a Frenchman who represents not only the government, but an entire nation which I esteem and honor—just what my ideas are about the annoying diplomatic difficulties that arise from time to time. I shall always be opposed to war, for I am convinced that neither Germany nor France desires it. Consequently our diplomates are at work in a field where an understanding is always possible, if not immediate."

CONSUMPTION
I have a positive remedy for the above disease; by its use thousands of cases of the worst kind and of long standing have been cured. So strong is my faith in its efficacy that I will send two bottles free, together with a valuable treatise on this disease to any sufferer. Give Express and P. O. address. T. A. SLOCUM, M. C., 181 Pearl St., N. Y.

The oldest medicine in the world is probably Dr. Isaac Thompson's CELEBRATED EYE WATER. It is a carefully prepared physician's prescription, and has been in use for NEARLY A CENTURY. For all external inflamation of the eyes it is an infallible remedy, and is unequalled in removing inflamation of the eyes, at the commencement, and in curing chronic cases. We invite the attention of physicians to its merits. For sale by all Druggists.

HOUSEHOLD.

Hints for the Home.

Chicago boasts of the most economic young lady in the west. When she washes her face she always laughs so as not to have so much face to wash.

Cracker Pudding.—Split a dozen crackers in halves, lay the surface placing over with raisins, the halves together again; tie tie up closely in a cloth, and boil about twenty minutes in milk and water; serve with a rich sauce.

Pork cake.—One pound of fat salt pork chopped fine, 1½ cups of boiling water poured over the pork, two pounds of raisins, currants and citron, two cups of sugar, eight cups of flour, one tablespoonful soda, and cloves and cinamon to taste.

For Washing Red Table Linen.—Use tepid water, with a little powdered borax, which serves to set the color; wash the linen seprately and quickly, using very little soap; rinse in tepid water containing a little boiled starch; hang to dry in the shade, gnd iron when almost dry.

The skin of a boiled egg is the most efficacious remedy that can be applied to a boil. Peel it carefully, cut a little hole in the center, for the head of the boil, wet and apply to the part affected. It will draw off the matter and relieve the soreness in a few hours.

A patent nutmeg grater and an ounce of nutmegs will keep a restless child busy and happy half a day turning the tiny crank, while the grated spice, carefully preserved from the air in a tin box, is a real help when one is hurried with cooking.

Major Alvord, an agricultural writer and close observer, would draw the milk in the pure open air, and thus have it thoroughly oxygenated. He says that when the cows are milked in the same air in which they stand, the milk will be bad, but if milked in fresh air the trouble will be obviated.

Since the bustle has been discarded sashes have taken its place. The draperies are drawn up on the sides, but behind the hips rather than upon them, and there are but few loops in the back, the requisite fullness being given by a sash of soft quality and tied in long floating loops and ends. When the figure is slim the sash is tied in smooth folds around the waist of a basque that has fullness on the shoulders and is shirred to the waist, but with those who are too stout to look well in shirred waists the basque is smooth and the sash is tied and set on behind.

Set a pitcher of water in the apartment, and in a few hours it will have absorbed nearly all the respired gases in the room, the air of which will have become purer, but the water utterly filthy. The colder the water the greater the capacity to contain these gases. At the ordinary temperature a pail of water will absorb a pint of carbonic acid gas and several pints of amonia. The capacity is nearly doubled by reducing the water to the temperature of ice. Hence the water kept in a room for a while is unfit for use.

Thirty yards of cotton cloth may be bleached in fifteen minutes by one large spoonful of sal soda and one pound of chloride of lime dissolved in soft water; after taking out the cloth rinse in cold soft water so that it may not rot. The color of French linen may be preserved by a bath in strong tea of common hay. Calicoes with pink or green colors will be brightened if vinegar is put in the rinsing water, while soda is used for purple and blue. If it is desired to set colors previous to washing put a spoonful of ox gall to a gallon of water and soak the fabrics in the liquid. Colored napkins are put in lye before washing to set the color. The color of black is freshened if it is put in a pail of water containing a teacupful of lye.—Good Housekeeping.

Be Ready for Accidents.

Good housekeepers, like good military commanders, provide for emergencies and disasters. It doesn't cost any more to buy two lamp chimneys together than to buy them at separate times, and having the extra one on hand for the time when it is needed often saves much annoyance and discomfort. Always keep in the house a supply of standard medical remedies, plenty of clean rags, a ball of twine, a supply of nails and screws; and be sure that the screw-driver and hammer are in their place all the time. Every house in the country ought to be provided with a ladder to reach the roof for use in case of fire, and there should never be a time when a pailful of water couldn't be got on the instant.

The Physician Must Probe.

"Can you give me a cure for biliousness, doctor?" an individual said the other day:

"I suppose he expected I would reply, "Oh, yes; here you are," write a prescription in my note book, tear out the leaf, and thrust it into his hand but I neither did nor said anything of the sort. My answer was somewhat as follows:

"My dear sir, biliousness depends on one or more of a dozen different causes, and the cause in your case I must find out before it is possible for me to do you an atom of good or write a single prescription."

And so it is with dyspepsia, reader. You cannot go to a doctor and order cures just as you order a new coat from your tailor. The physician must probe and probe until he makes himself acquainted with the cause of disturbance; then out will come his note book quickly enough, and if you follow his advice and take his medicine, in nine cases out of ten you will find yourself a new being in less than a month.—"Family Doctor" in Cassell's Magazine.

AN IRISH ELOPEMENT.

"Arden Hill, my dear old chappie, of all others I was most anxious to see you to-day."

The speaker was rather a good-looking young fellow, who wore the cap and gown of a student of Trinity college, Dublin, and as he spoke he laid his hand familiarly on the shoulder of a friend standing at a bookstall by the college wall, and absorbed in the pages of a volume picked up haphazardly.

"Well, Dillon, what is it?"

"I think you will do me a service, which, while it will not entail a great deal of trouble on you, may help to secure my future happiness."

"Of course, it goes without saying that I will. But what makes Maurice Dillon look solemn as an undertaker at his wife's funeral?"

"This is not the place to tell you, Hill. Come across to the 'Star and Garter,' and over a chop and a glass of bitter beer you can hear the story."

Seated in a quiet corner of that snug hostelry Mr. Dillon commenced:

"You are a Kings county man, Hill—Tullamore, I believe."

His companion nodded an affirmative, and Dillon went on:

"A dirty little hole of a town, built in a bog, isn't it? In fact, I may take it, you are a bog-trotter."

You may take it that I am a genuine bog-trotter, but, Dillon, if you please, you will cast no aspersions on my native town.

"Oh! I mean no offense, I assure you," Dillon explained, with a laugh. But I was thinking of the saying that Charles Lever has left on record. He says that among Irish towns Tullamore is only remarkable for the superlative ugliness of its female natives. There, now, don't get your back up. I'm willing not to believe a word of it. But tell me, am I safe in assuming that you know the country within a radius of a dozen miles of Tullamore."

"Every inch of it; but what is all this leading up to?"

"Will you have patience—two weeks ago when you and Watkins and I saw Irving as Hamlet in the Theatre Royal, there was a lady in the dress-circle whom Arthur Watkins had promised to see home, in company with her pa; but he found our discussion on the relative merits of Irving and Barry Sullivan so very interesting that the lady was forgotten."

"Indeed; but, anyway, Watkins is the last man in the university to allow a woman's eyes to distract his thoughts from sober studies; and now let me ask you again, what is all this leading up to? For a Trinity college man you have, I must say, a particularly lucid style in telling a story."

Arthur Watkins' father and the father of this young lady are very anxious to make a match between them, and the young people, with proverbial perversity are adverse to entering into any such arrangement. Watkins would regard a wife simply as a nuisance and a bore."

"And the lady?"

"The lady, I believe—or, rather, I sincerely hope, loves another."

"A very friendly aspiration, upon my soul, Dillion."

"You will scarcely blame me when I say that Lucy and I are——"

"Oh! So the cat is out of the bag, is it, Master Maurice! And with your keen appreciation of honor do you think this a matter to boast of? You have wronged a friend who——"

"I haven't done anything of the sort, Hill, and I wish you wouldn't think it. Lucy and I knew each other—well, were fond of each other—there now—before Watkins loomed up as an unwilling rival. The friends of Watkins, you know are wealthy, while I—but 'tis the old story. Lucy's father desires to secure a rich husband for his only child."

Hill crossed his arms on the table, and looking in his friend's face said quietly: "And don't you know he's right, Maurice Dillon? Since my childhood days I do not think that any single individual ever slandered me by saying that I possessed even a moderate share of common sense, but I say to marry a girl where that marriage must necessarily entail the life of a pauper is something that only a scamp or a fool would do, and for friendship's sake I'm disposed to class you in the latter category."

"I'm not in a mood to hear a sermon from you now, Hill. Tell me, do you know a place near Tullamore called Raheenbeg?"

About as well as I know college Green," was Hill's reply.

"Well, Rabeenbeg is Lucy's home, and Watkins has an invitation to visit there this week. He is going, reluctantly he tells me, and if he goes it is easy to anticipate the result. No man, not even Arthur Watkins, could resist the charms of Lucy Damer, and should she be coerced into accepting him as a suitor, it would simply drive me to the devil."

Dillon rose from his chair and paced the room a minute or two in silence. Then he said abrubtly:

"I am going down there to-night, Hill, and I want you to come with me."

"It's two years since I have been at home, and honestly I don't care to go in that direction just now: but, anyway, how could I serve you?"

"Lucy is coming to elope with me. Now, don't look so horrified, man. Her father, Parson Damer, apprehends something of the kind, and as a consequence she is as jealously guarded as a political suspect in Kilmainham. I shall tell you our plans on my way down. A train leaves Kingsbridge at 3:30. We shall reach Geashell at 6, and if all goes well—and much depends on you—we shall catch the 7:30 train at the same station."

"Are you sure you are acting squarely by this young girl Dillon! She loves you, or believes she loves you, which amounts to the same thing, I suppose. She is willing to leave home and father for your sake, and what will you give her in return? Why, you will scarcely have a shilling of your own to commence housekeeping with, and her father is reported as poor as a church-mouse."

"Don't fling any more of your infernal homilies at my head. I must have Lucy if we begged together. She is willing to take the risks, and Hill, you have promised to stand by me."

It was a cold, wet night when Dillon and his friend reached the little station where their journey by rail terminated. As they emerged from the gate they found a solitary car on the roadside and Hill at once recognized the driver.

"Hello! Mickey Leddy; a wet night, isn't it?"

"Arrah! Mr. Hill, is id yerself that's in 'id? Yis, glory be t' God! Id's a wet night, surely, an' I suppose ye'll have a sate home wid me."

"No, I'm not going home, Mickey, but if you're disengaged you might drive this gentleman, and me over to Raheenbeg."

"Faix, an' sure I will. Jump up on the other side an' I'll have ye there in a jiffy."

"How fortunate to find this car here, Hill," said Dillon, as they started down the road.

"Yes, my friend, it is wonderful what opportunities are afforded a man when he is bent on going to the devil headlong. You will drop me at the churchyard wall, Mickey. Don't you know it!"

"Do I kow it, is id, Measha, sure ye haven't forgot the day we wor at the coorsin' match, whin Joe Coloille's greyhound Mabel took two turns out ov the hare in. Odlum's forty-acre field that's up against id. An' be the same token we had a glass of spirits aich in Nancy Kelly's shebeen at the Meetenaus on the way home that Joe said was the best that he ever tasted, an' ye know he ought to be a judge."

Five minutes' walk from the place of rendezvous brought Hill to the residence of the Rev. Mr. Damer. A female servant admitted him to the hall, and in response to the question, was Mr. Damer at home, that gentleman made his appearance from a room in the rear of the house.

"I regret sir," said Hill, with great gravity, to be the bearer of unpleasant tidings. Mr. Watkins—you know Arthur Watkins, of Trinity—has met with an accident of serious nature within half a mile of your house." Before the clergyman could utter a word Hill went on with nervous rapidity, "I met him by accident at Portarlington station, and as I was driving over to Killeigh I induced him to accept a seat as far as your residence, and I fear poor Arthur is seriously hurt. Then, as the vehicle is badly smashed, I came on here to seek assistance."

"This is, indeed, lamentable news; but come inside, sir, while I give directions to have my own car got ready. Barbara, you will go to Miss Damer's room and tell her I wish to speak to her."

Barbara lingered a moment at the door when her master left the room to eye the visitor inquisitively.

He drew a note from the inner pocket of his coat, and approaching her, said: "Barbara, my dear, will you give this note to your mistress and tell her Mr. Dillon is waiting for her in the shadow of the churchyard wall?"

"O, may the Lord save us! Maybe its what he wants to run away with her."

"Faith, maybe it is my dear; but don't let that frighten you. Who knows but one of these days some likely young fellow will be after running away with youself? But had you not better give that letter to your mistress at once, and tell her, as her father will drive in an opposite direction to where her lover waits her, she will have the chance of meeting him at last."

A few minutes later Mr. Damar and his daughter entered the room. Miss Damar was scarcely pretty, and Hill wondered at his friend's blindness until she raised her eyes to his—

Eyes too expressive to be blue,
Too lovely to be gray.

And which certainly gave a singular charm to her face.

"I have told my daughter, sir, and since we cannot start for a quarter of an hour or so, you will take some refreshments."

"Couldn't hear of it, sir," Hill said hurridly, "I must return to our poor friend at once, and I am sure you will make all haste possible." Before the clergyman could reply Mr. Hill was out of the room, and as he descended the steps he muttered with a sigh of relief: "Heaven be thanked for this lucky escape from an ugly predicament."

At 10:30 that night Maurice Dillon, with Lucy clinging to his arm, entered the parlor of a cottage in a Dublin suburb. A gray-haired lady was reading by the fire, whom Dillon addressed as follows: "Aunt Mary, this is Lucy Damer, whom you know I have long loved. Since the powers that be were against us we've taken the law into our own hands, and I ran away with her to-night."

Aunt Mary looked at the trembling girl for a moment, and said with calm severity: "In my younger days, Miss Damer, an Irish girl had a reputation for modesty for which her countrymen were very proud. And you, sir, an Irish gentleman, have dared to compromise the honor of this young lady by your criminal recklessness."

"I've only followed the example of an ancestor of ours, who is your own particular hero, Aunt Mary. That Capt. Maurice Dillon, who fought with Lord Clare at Fontenoy, ran away with as pure and true a girl as ever bore the name of wife."

"I'm not going to split logical straw with you, sir. You will return to your college immediately, and 'twill be a miracle if they don't expel you yet. Come over to the fire, Miss Damer, you are positively shivering with the cold, and you will give me your papa's address. I shall telegraph to him in the morning."

"Oh! Miss Dillon, please."

"Yes, Aunt Mary is right, as she always is. I shall go into town, of course, and don't cry, Lucy. Aunt Mary will be very kind to you, for didn't I tell you on our way up that she's a thousand bricks?"

"Young man, how often have I told you not to use slang in my presence?"

And by way of answer he threw his arms around her neck and gave her a resounding kiss; but it was almost timidly he took Lucy's hand in his to to say good night, although he looked yearningly in the eyes that long ago had made him captive. Perhaps Aunt Mary saw that yearning glance and the look of love that answered it. I only know that as her nephew left the room she said in gentle tones: "Miss Damer, that careless boy always leaves the hall door open. Will you kindly close it after him?"

Which of my fair readers has not already arrived at the conclusion that Maurice and Lucy were married? He is now a physician of respectable practice in a country town, and in Lucy's home and his there is a little toddler who has learned to love the gentle, gray-haired lady who often visits that happy home, and who, he would tell you, is his own Aunt Mary.

Something for Topers.

Philadelphia News.—You likely number among your friends and acquaintances some hearty old chap who has "taken a drink of good whisky before breakfast for forty-seven years, and couldn't eat without it." Now at the risk of having this worthy but prejudiced person laugh himself into a state of apoplectic, redfacedness let me suggest that as old as he is, he may yet find a substitute—not only a cheaper one, but one that will never coax him to take more than is good for him. Take any man who is in the habit of looking in the bottom of the glass for "pure sociability" at intervals from noon until midnight, and for stomach comfort before he breaks his fast in the morning, and let him, after he has arisen and dressed, repair to a drug store instead of a bar-room. He has no appetite. He does not feel as though he was "all there." Instead of a cocktail, let him ask the druggist to prepare a mixture of these ingredients and quantities, which, when mixed together, shall constitute a single dose:

Chloroform, five drops.
Tincture of ginger, half teaspoonful.
Compound tincture cardsmen, two teaspoonfuls.
Water, one wineglass.

Swallow that slowly—take five minutes to do it. You will be surprised to find that in about fifteen minutes the "all gone" feeling will have disappeared. A gentle, pleasant warmth is felt in place of the gnawing sensation, and in a very little while there are decided symptoms of being hungry. A repetition of the dose inside of an hour, in case the attack the night before was very severe, will do no harm. A cup of black coffee twenty minutes after the first dose is an excellent thing to follow with, provided the patient is not of a particularly nervous temperament.

You will find some men whose nerves become unstrung upon very slight alcoholic provocation and such men are prone to try the similia similibus curantur racket. The best thing for a case of that kind is the drug store again. Here is the dose:

Bromide of potassium, thirty grains.
Celerina, two teaspoonfuls.
Elixir valerianate ammonia, two teaspoonfuls.

I'll guarantee that you will never resort to whisky again after you have tried whichever of these doses which may suit your particular case. As soon as you feel able to eat, make your breakfast of oatmeal principally for two or three days. On the day after taking the first dose, invest in two Havana oranges and substitute the juice for the pick-me-up tonic. If the stomach rejects the oranges as too sweet, throw them away and try the tonic again, but eventually return to the fruit.

This treatment will begin to show its effect in a very few days. Instead of that uneasy, uncomfortable feeling there will come a vigor and a natural exhilaration that will brighten the eye and quicken the step. A brisk walk around the block, if you live in the brick and mortar section, will not come amiss. I would even go so far as to advise a five minutes' exercise with half-pound dumb-bells. Grasp them firmly and strike out as though you intended thumping somebody. All that is needed is faith and a little perseverance, especially perseverance.

China's Great Wall.

Of course we had to go to the great wall of China, says a Pekin correspondent of the Davenport Democrat. China abounds in great walls. Her mural defenses were most extensive—walled country, walled cities, walled villages, walled palaces and temples—wall after wall and wall within wall. But the greatest of all is the great wall of China, which crests the mountain range and crosses the gorge from here some forty miles away. To go to Pekin and not go out to the wall would be unpardonable. It matters not that the Pekin wall is higher and wider, nor that the way is cold and rough and often perilous—you must go and see the great wall.

Six mortal hours to make the last fifteen miles. Squeezing through the last deep gorge and a deep rift in solid rock, cut out by ages of rolling wheels and tramping feet, we reach the great frowning, double-bastioned gate of stone and hard-burned brick—one archway tumbled in. This was the object of our mission—the great wall of China built 213 years before our era; built of great slabs of well-hewn stone, laid in regular courses some twenty feet high, and then topped out with large, hard-burned brick, filled in with earth and closely paved on the top with more dark, tawny brick—the ramparts high and thick and castellated for use of arms. Right and left the great wall sprung far up the mountain side—now straight, now curved, to meet the mountain ridge, turreted each 300 feet—a frowning mass of masonry. No need to tell you of this wall; the books will tell you that—how it was built to keep the warlike Tartars out—twenty-five feet high by forty thick, 1,200 miles long, with room on top for six horses to be ridden abreast. Nor need I tell you that for 1,400 years it kept those hordes at bay, nor that in the main the material used upon it is just a good, and firm and strong as when put in place. To tell you how one feels while standing on this vast work, scrutinizing its old masonry, its queer old cannon, and ambitious sweep along the mountain crest, were only folly. In speechless awe we strolled or sat and gazed in silent wonder. Twelve hundred miles of this gigantic work, built on the rugged, craggy mountain tops, vaulting over gorges, spanning wild streams, netting the river archways with huge, hard bars of copper; with double gates, with swinging doors and bars set thick with iron armor—a wonder in the world, before which the old-time classic seven wonders, all gone now save the great pyramid, were toys. The great pyramid has 85,000,000 cubic feet, the great wall 6,350,000,000 cubic feet. An engineer in Seward's party here some years ago gave it as his opinion that the cost of this wall, figuring labor at the same rate, would more than equal that of all the 100,000 miles of railroad in the United States. The material it contains would build a wall six feet high and two feet thick right straight around the globe. Yet this was done in only twenty years, without a trace of debt or bond. It is the greatest individual labor the world has ever known. You stand before it as before the great Omnipotent—bowed and silent.

DAKOTA JOTTINGS.

The Aberdeen Improvement company has contracted for 300 trees to be planted in Sheridan park.

The Bridgewater Times says: "Several saloonists are making preparations to open in Bridgewater."

The annual session of the Dakota Horticultural society will be held at Mitchell December 18 to 20.

The artesian well at Brookings has been abandoned at a depth of 500 feed on account of sand and limestone.

The citizens of Yankton are becoming alarmed on account of the prevalence of scarlet fever in the country surrounding the city.

The town council at Iroquois has placed fire extinguishers in several buildings about town where they will be handy in cases of emergency.

The trustees of the Presbyterian church at Sioux Falls have extended a call to Rev. S. N. Hutchinson, of Marengo, Ill.

The safe in Olson and Detlie's blacksmith shop at Sioux Falls was blown open last Thursday morning by burglars and $150 in cash taken therefrsm.

The Gettysburg school board will very soon be obliged to provide a third school-room and teacher for the accommodation of the rising generation of that town.

Eight new coal mines all within six miles of Minot have been opened within a week. This makes ten in all. Coal sells for $2.50 per ton at the mines.

The Presbyterian university at Pierre is so overrun with students that lodging room is now at a premium, and arrangements are on foot for the erection of another wing or dormitory to the college.

The citizens of Pennington county are considering the advisability of increasing the membership of the board of county commissioners from three to five or redistricting the county.

Chas. Martell and Mrs. Sullivan, of Grafton were married. The groom is 24 years old and the bride has tarried on this earth for 75 years. She gave the young man $500 and promised to leave him her entire fortune when she dies.

The Catholic parochial school at Aberdeen is now running in good shape and has in the neighborhood of fifty pupils in attendance. The academy has not yet been opened, though nearly every thing is in readiness.

The Pioneer says: "A spirit of religion seems to have seized the average Deadwood man. Though the streets were by no means deserted, more than one-half the adult population attended divine worship in one or another of the various churches.

The Lead City Herald says: "It is estimated that fully $2,500,000 have been sent into the Black Hills alone, this season, in return for the cattle shipped out, $10,000 of which went into the pockets of farmers and small shippers."

Three barbers were arrested at Fargo on the charge of violating the Sunday closing ordinance. Two of them plead guilty and paid their fines, but the other, the proprietor of a shop, on whom a heavy fine was imposed, gave bond and will appeal the case to the district court in order to test the legality of the ordinance.

The Milwaukee Mechanics' Mutual Insurance company, refusing to pay J. M Severson for the loss of a building in Vermillion, action was brought in the district court at Yankton. The jury awarded Severson $1,325, the full amount of the claim. Payment of the insurance was refused because of the alleged tardy notice of the loss.

J. C. Bennett, a lawyer of East Grand Forks, has gone to Duluth, leaving numerous creditors behind. Accompanying him was a Miss Florence Lepperd, whom he brought from England a short time ago and with whom, it is said, he has been cohabiting. Bennett drove his wife and child away about two months ago, she returning to London, Eng., her former home, where she is now engaged as a mill hand.

John Fogleburg was before Justice Cutts at Grand Forks charged with perjury. Fogleburg swore that Julius Cresien of Larimore sold him a glass of whiskey on a certain day in the club house at Larimore. Cresien proves that he was in Grand Forks on the day in question, hence the arrest of Fogleburg. He waived examination and was held to the grand jury in $2,000.

A resident of Kimball subscribed $50 four years ago in aid of the Methodist church of that city. A day or two ago he began packing up his goods preparatory to leaving the town, when an attachment against his stuff was procured by the church trustees. His excuse for not paying is that one of the brethren bet a barrel of apples on Harrison's election.

Representatives of twenty-four miles in Southern Dakota met at Aberdeen for the purpose of organizing an association. The object of organization is to advance the standard of the milling industry, and any intention of a trust or combination is expressly denied. Efforts will be made to secure uniformity in grades and to prevent pirating of brands by Eastern dealers. Conversation with millers from nearly every section of Southern and Central Dakota develops the fact that their wheat in store is generally less than last year. Estimates of yield per acre in fifteen counties show an average yield of 11,60 bushels this year, as against 10.87 in 1887, the highest average given being 15 and lowest 6 bushels.

A Photographer's Story.

Photographer in New York Press.

"I was alone in the store one morning when there entered a very charming young lady. She asked to see some pictures of favorite actors and selected quite a number. Then she started to go, but coming back as though a sudden thought struck her, said. "Oh, by the way, have you the picture of Mr.——?" naming someone I had never heard of. Upon my answering in the negative she continued: Now, that's really too bad. Cannot you get the picture for me?' 'But I do not know who the gentleman is you refer to,' I said. She looked at me in apparent astonishment. 'Why, he's Mr. So and So, and he's an actor in such and such a theater,,' naming one of the best known. 'Indeed,' I replied, I must look into the matter.'

"The same day I hunted up the pedigree of the famous actor and found that he was a young man comparatively new to the stage who was filling a three-line part in a popular play then running. He was a very handsome fellow, though. In a day or two she came again. 'Did you get that picture for me?' she inquired. I told her that it would be foolish of me to add to my stock the photograph of a young man who was so little known. 'But I must have his picture,' she said, and looked so disappointed that I rather pitied her. I told her that I would have the young man's picture taken and put it on sale if she would pay me $50 as a quarantine against loss. 'It's a bargian," she said, 'when can I have some?"

"Well, I saw the actor, and the poor fellow was almost overwhelmed with delight when I told him that I wanted to add his picture to those in my window. It seems that he had been in very hard luck, and getting out of an engagement through sickness, had accepted the minor role, in which he was then acting. Inside of three weeks his picture was in my window as per agreement, and, to my surprise, sold well from the start. But the strange part is to come. One day a gentleman sauntered in, and while looking over some pictures came across one of my young men. He appeared surprised. Before he went he ordered some pictures of the young man and handed me his card.

"On it was the name of the manager of the very theater at which the young man was playing. Not long after the manager's visit I noticed that the sale of the young actor's photographs began to boom, and then I learned that he had been given a more prominent part and was fast becoming a favorite. Then I told the young man about the young lady and he was all interest at once. He wanted to know everything about her, and made me describe her to him over and over again. After that I didn't see him for nearly a year, when one afternoon who should come in but the young man, and who should be on his arm but the young lady. 'Allow me,' he said, proud and happy as could be, 'to introduce my wife to you.' Well, sir, you could have knocked me down with a feather. He is now a well known popular New York actor."

Another indictment was returned by the Chicago grand jury, against Thomas Tallman, late cashier of the bankrupt Traders' bank. This indictment covers the $70,000 of deposits received on Oct. 1, three days before the bank failed. This sum was made up of a number of deposits, and there is a count in the indictment for each.

Will Schrieber, teller of the First National bank of Columbus, Ind., has fled to Canada after robbing the bank of $8,500. L. K. Long, cashier of the bank received a telegram from Schrieber in which the latter stated that he would be in Toronto. There is a woman in the case. Schrieber has been supporting her in costly style. It is possible that the loss may exceed the sum named. Schrieber is twenty-two years old, and has been in the bank's employ six years.

were dropped from the rolls during the year for various causes, and at the close of the year the number of pensioners of all classes receiving pensions was 452,557. Of these there were 806 survivors of the war of 1812, 10,787 widows of those who served in that war, 16,060 soldiers of the Mexican war and 5,104 widows of said soldiers. One hundred and two different rates of pensions are paid to these beneficiaries, ranging from $2 to $416.66 per month. The amount paid for pensions during the fiscal year was $78,775,861.92, being an increase over the preceding year of $5,308,280.22. The expenses attending the maintenance and operation of the pension bureau during that period was $3,262-574.67, making the entire expenditures of the bureau $82,038,386.57, being 21½ per cent of the total expenditures of the government during the year. I am thoroughly convinced that our general pension laws should be revised and adjusted to meet as far as possible, in the light of our experience, all meritorious cases. The fact that 102 different rates of pensions are paid cannot in my opinion be made consistent with justice to the pensioner or to the government, and the numerous private pension bills that are passed, predicated upon the imperfection of general laws, while they increase, in many cases, existing in equality and injustice, lend additional force to the recommendation for a revision of the general laws on this subject. The laxity of ideas prevailing among a large number of our people regarding pensions is becoming every day more marked. The principles upon which they should be granted are in danger of being altogether ignored, and already pensions are often claimed because the applicants are as much entitled as other successful applicants, rather than upon any disability reasonably attributable to military service. If the establishment of various precedents be continued, if the granting of pensions be not divorced from partisan and other unworthy and irrelevant considerations, and if the honorable name of veteran unfairly becomes by these means but another term for one who constantly clamors for the aid of the government, there is danger that injury will be done to the fame and patriotism of many whom our citizens all delight to honor, and that a prejudice will be aroused unjust to meritorious applicants for pensions.

AGRICULTURE.

The Work Accomplished by the Department of Agriculture—Plans to Eradicate Pleuro-Pneumonia.

The department of agriculture has continued, with a good measure of success, its efforts to develop the processes, enlarge the results and augment the profits of American husbandry. It has collected and distributed practical information, introduced and tested new plants, checked the spread of contagious disease of farm animals, resisted the advance of noxious insects and destructive fungus growth, and sought to secure to agricultural labor the highest reward of effort and the fullest immunity from loss. Its records of the year show that the season of 1888 has been of medium production. A generous supply of the demands of consumption has been assured, and a surplus for exportation, moderate in certain products and bountiful in others, will prove a benefaction alike to buyer and grower. Four years ago it was found that the great cattle industry of the country was endangered, and those engaged in it were alarmed at the rapid extension of the European plague of pleuro-pneumonia. Serious outbreaks existed in Illinois, Missouri, Kentucky and in Tennessee. Animals affected were held quarantine. Five counties in New York and from one to four counties in each of the states of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland were almost equally affected. With this great danger upon us and with the contagion already in the channels of commerce, with the enormous direct and indirect losses already being caused by it, and when only prompt and energetic action could be successful, there were in none of these states any laws authorizing this department to eradicate the malady or giving the state officials power to co-operate with it for the purpose. The department even lacked both the requisite appropriation and authority. By securing state co-operation in connection with authority from congress has been pressed successfully and this dreaded disease has been extirpated from the Western states, and also from the Eastern states, with the exception of a few restricted areas which are still under supervision. The danger has thus been removed, and trade and commerce have been freed from the vexatious state restrictions which were deemed necessary for a time.

During the past four years the process of diffusion as applied to the manufacture of sugar from sorghum and sugar cane has been introduced into the country and fully perfected by the experiments carried on by the department of agriculture. This process is now universally conceded to be the most economical one, and it is through it that the sorghum sugar industry has been established upon a firm basis and the road to its future success opened. The adoption of this diffusion process is also extending in Louisiana and other sugar-producing parts of the country, and will doubtless soon be the only method employed for the extraction of sugar from the cane. An exhaustive study has also, within the same period, been undertaken of the subject of food adulteration and the best analytical methods for detecting it. A part of the results of this work has already been published by the department, which, with the matter in course of preparation, will make the most complete treatise on that subject that has ever been published in any country. The department seeks a progressive development. It would combine the discoveries of science with the economies and amelioration of rural practice. A supervision of the endowed experimental station system recently provided for is a proper function of the department and is now in operation. This supervision is very important and should be wisely and vigilantly directed to the end that the pecuniary aid of the government in favor of intelligent agriculture should be so applied as to result in the general good and to the benefit of all our people, thus justifying the appropriation made from the public treasury.

RAILROADS.

Consideration of the Majority Report of the Pacific Roads Commission—In Conclusion.

The adjustment of the relations between the government and the railroad companies which have received land grants, and the guaranty of the public credit in aid of the construction of the railroads, should receive early attention. The report of a majority of the commissioners appointed to examine the affairs and indebtedness of these roads, in which they favor an extension of the time for the payment of such indebtedness in at least one case, where the corporation appears to be able to comply with well guarded and exact terms of such extension and their enforcement by gentlemen of undoubted business judgment and experience appointed to protect the interests of the goverment as directors of said corporation, may well lead to the belief that such an extension would be to the advantage of the government. The subject should be treated as a business proposition with a view to a final realization of its indebtedness by the government rather than as a question to be decided upon prejudice or by way of punishment for previous wrong doing. The report of the commissioner of the District of Columbia with its accompanying documents, gives in detail the operations of the several departments of the district government, and furnish evidence that the financial affairs of the district are at present in such satisfactory condition as to justify the commissioners in submitting to congress estimates for desirable and needed improvements.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

The commissioners recommend certain legislation which, in their opinion, is necessary to advance the interests of the district. I invite your special attention to their request for such legislation as will enable the commissioners without delay to collect, digest and properly arrange the laws by which the district is governed, and which are now embraced in several collections, making them available only with great difficulty. The suggestions they make touching desirable amendments to the laws relative to licenses granted for carrying on the retail traffic in spiritous liquors, to the observance of Sunday, to the proper assessment and collection of taxes and the speedy punishment of minor offenders, and to the management and control of the reformatory and charitable institutions supported by congressional appropriations, are commended to care and consideration. I again call attention to the present inconvenience and the danger to life and property attending the operation of steam railroads throughout and across the public streets and roads of the district. The propriety of such legislation as will properly guard the use of these railroads and better secure the convenience and safety of citizens is manifest.

The consciousness that I have presented, but an imperfect statement of the condition of our country and its wants, occasions no fear that anything omitted is not known and appreciated by the congress upon whom rests the responsibility of intelligent legislation in behalf of a great nation and confiding people. As public servants we shall do our duty well if we constantly guard the rectitude of our intentions; maintain unsullied our love of country, and with unselfish purposes strive for the public good.

Scottish Boys Not Profane.

It is said that boys in Scotland are not in the habit of using profane words. When a gang of Scottish boys in one of Mr. Blacke's novels suspended one of their number over a stream with the threat that he would be dropped therein if he did not "say a swear," the worst thing he could think of was "deevil." But that was considered so bad that he was promptly released.—New York Tribune.

DIET AND MORALITY.

God Gave the Ancients Food Which Was Suggestive of Moral Qualities.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.,—Nov. 25—Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., preached, taking for his text: "And these are they which ye shall have in abomination among the fowls; the owl, the vulture, and the bat. These also shall be unclean to you among the creeping things that creep upon the earth; the chameleon and the snail."—Leviticus, xi. 13-30. Following is the discourse in full:

The Bible offers every possible variety of theme, of argument, and of illustration. We care not in what kind of a pitcher the water of life is brought, if it is only the clear, pure water. God gave the ancients a list of the animals that they might eat, and a list of animals that they might not eat. These people lived in a hot climate, and certain forms of animal food corrupted their blood and disposed them to scrofulous disorders, depraved their appetites and bemeaned their souls. A man's food, when he has the means and opportunity of selecting it, suggests his moral nature. The reason the wild Indian is as cruel as the lion is because he has food that gives him the blood of the lion. A missionary among the Indians says that, by changing his style of food to correspond with theirs, his temperament was entirely changed. There are certain forms of food that have a tendency to affect the moral nature. Many a Christain is trying to do by prayer that which can not be done except through corrected diet. For instance, he who uses swine's flesh for constant diet will be diseased in body and polluted of soul—all his liturgies and catechisms notwithstanding. The Gadarine swine were possessed of the devil, and ran down a steep place into the sea, and all the swine ever since seem to have been similarly possessed. In Leviticus, God struck this meat off the table of His people, and placed before them a bill of fare at once healthful, nutritious and generous.

But, higher than this physical reason, there was a spiritual reason why God chose certain forms of food for the ancients. God gave a peculiar diet to his people, not only because he wanted them to be distinguished from the surrounding nations, but because certain birds and animals, by reason of their habits, have always been suggestive of moral qualities. By the list of things from which they were to abstain God wished to prejudice their minds against certain evils; and in the list of lawful things given, he wished to suggest certain forms of good. When God solemly forbade his people to eat the owl, the vulture, the bat, the chameleon, and the snail. He meant to drive out of His people all the sins that were thus emblemized.

I take the suggestion of the text, and say that one of the first unclean things the Christian needs to drive out of his soul is the owl. The owl is the melancholy bird of night. It hatches out whole broods of superstitions. It is doleful and hideous. When it sings, it sings through its nose. It loves the gloom of night better than the brightness of day. Who has not slept in the cabin near the woods, and been awakened in the night by the dismal "too-hoo" of the owl? Melancholy is the owl that is perched in many a Christian soul. It is an unclean bird, and needs to be driven away. A man whose sins are pardoned, and who is on the road to heaven, has no right to be gloomy. He says. "I have so many doubts." That is because "you are lazy." Go actively to work in Christ's cause, and your doubts will vanish. You say: "I have lost my property;' but I reply: "You have infinite treasures laid up in heaven." You say: I am weak and sickly and going to die." Then be congratulated that you are so near eternal health and perpetual gladness. Catch a few morning larks for your soul, and stone this owl off your premises.

As a little girl was eating, the sun dashed upon her spoon, and she cried out: "O, mamma, I have swallowed a spoonful of sunshine!" Would God that we might all indulge in the same beverage! Cheerfulness—it makes the homliest face handsome; it makes the hardest mattress soft; it runs the loom that weaves buttercups, and rainbows, and auroras. God made the grass, black? No; that would be too sombre. God made the grass red? No; that would be too gaudy. God made the grass green, that by this parable all the world might be led to a subdued cheerfulness. Read your Bible in the sunshine. Remember that your physical health is closely allied to your spiritual. The heart and the liver are only a few inches apart, and what affects one affects the other. A historian records that by the sound of great laughter in Rome, Hannibal's assaulting army was frightened away in retreat. And there is in the great outbursting joy of a Christian soul that which can drive back any infernal beleaguement. Rats love dark closets, and Satan loves to burrow in a gloomy soul. "Rejoice in the Lord, O ye righteous! and again I say, rejoice!"

Hoist the window of your soul in this the 12 o'clock of your spiritual night. Put the gun to your shoulder, and aim at the black jungle from which the hooting comes, pull the trigger, and drop that croaking, loathsome, hideous owl of religious melancholy into the bushes.

Again; taking the suggestion of the text, drive out the vulture from your soul. God would not allow the Jews to eat it. It lives on carcasses; it fattens among the dead; with leaden wing it circles about battle fields. Wilson, the American ornithologist, counted 237 vultures around one carcass. If crossing the desert when there is no sign of a wing in the air, a camel perish out of the caravan, immediately the air begins to darken with vultures. There are many professed Christians who have a vulture in their souls. They pray upon the character and feelings of others. A doubtful reputation is a banquet for them. Some rival in trade or profession falls, and the vulture puts out its head. These people revel in the details of a man's ruin. They say: "I told you so." They rush into some store and say; "Have you heard the news? Just as I expected! Our neighbor has gone all to pieces! Good for him!"

That professedly Christian woman, having heard of the wrong doing of some sister in the church, instead of hiding the sin with the mantle of charity, peddles it along the streets. She takes the afternoon to make her long neglected calls. She tells the story 20 times before sundown, and every time tells it larger. She rushes into the parlors to tell it, and into the nursery to tell it, and into the kitchen to tell it. She says: "Would you have thought it? Well, I always said there was something wrong about her. Why, I should not speak to her if I saw her in the street. Is it not horrible? But better not say anything about it, because there may be some mistake. I do not want my name involved in the matter. I guess I will just go over and ask them at No. 263 whether they have heard it. Guess it must be so, for Mary Ann says that her husband saw a man who heard from his business partner that his blind old grandmother had seen something that looked very suspicious!"

The most loathsome, miserable, God-forsaken wretch on earth is a gossip. I can tell her on the street, though I have never seen her before. She walks fast, and has her bonnet strings loose, for she has not had time to tie them since she heard that last scandal. She looks both ways as she passes, hoping to see new evidences of depravity in the windows. I think that when Satan has a job so infinitely mean that in all the pit he cannot find a devil mean enough to do it, and all bribes and threats have failed to get one ready for the infernal crusade, he says to one of his sergeants: "Go up to Brooklyn, and in such a street, on such a corner, get that gossipping woman, and she will be glad to do it." And sure enough, like a hungry fish, she takes the hook in her mouth and Satan slackens the line, and lets her run out farther and farther, until after while he says: "It is time to haul in that line," and with a few strong pulls he brings her to the beach of fire. What do you say? That she was a member of the church? I cannot help that. When Satan goes a-fishing, he does not care what school the fish belong to, whether it is a Presbyterian mackerel or an Episcopalian salmon. Amidst the thunder crash of Sinai, God said: "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor." And in Leviticus, he says: "Thou shalt not go up and down as a tale-bearer." Take not into your ear that scum of hell that people call tittle-tattle. Whosoever willingly listens to a slander is equally guilty with the one who tells it, and an old writer says they ought both to be hung, one by the tongue and the other by the ear. Do not smile upon such a spaniel, lest, like a pleased dog, he put his dirty paw upon you. Throw back the shutter of your soul, oh, Christian men and women, and see if there be within you a vulture with filthy talons and cruel beak. Let not this unclean thing roost in your soul, for my text says: "Ye shall hold in abomination among the fowls, the vulture."

Again, taking the suggestion of the text, drive out the bat from your soul. No wonder God set this bird among the unclean. It is an offense to every one. Let it fly into the window of a summer night, and all the hands, young and old, are against it. It is half bird and half mouse. It seems made partly to walk and partly to fly, and does neither well; and becomes an emblem of those Christians who try to cling to earth and heaven at the same time. They want to walk on earth in worldliness, and yet fly toward heaven in spirituality; and their soul, between feet and wings, is constantly perplexed. Oh, my brethren, be one thing or the other! Choose the world, if you prefer it, and see how many dollars you can win, and how much applause you can gain, and how large a business you can establish, and how grand a house you can build, and how fast a span of horses you can drive. You may be prospered until you can fail for $500,000, instead of having the disgrace of failing only $10,000 as some unenterprising people do. It is quite a reward to be able for 10 or 20 years to be called one of the solid men of Brooklyn or Boston; and then, to make your fortune last as long as possible, we will give you a splendid funeral, and you will have 25 carriages following you, with somebody in the most of them, and your coffin shall have silver handles on the sides, and we will mourn for you in splendid pocket-handkerchiefs bound with crape, and with bombazine 20 full yards long, trailing half across the parlor, so that all the company may stand upon it, and we will write our letters for the next six months on paper edged with black. But my friends, your worldly fortunes will not last, I will buy out now all that you will be worth in worldly estate 75 years from now. I have the money in my pocket with which to do it. Here it is! Two cents! It is a large sum to offer for all you will possess at the close of 75 years. Choose the world, if you want to; but if not, then choose heaven. That estate lies partly on this side of the river, but mostly on the other. It is ever accumulating. The prospect of it makes one independent of earthly misfortunes; so that Rogers, the martyr, slept so soundly the night before his burning they violently shook him in order to get him awake in time for the execution; and Paul exults at the thought of the "joy unspeakable and full of glory." Oh, choose earth or heaven! Make up your mind whether you will walk in earthly joys, or fly with heavenly expectations. Be not a bat, fit neither to walk nor fly, having just enough of heaven to spoil the world, and so much of the world as to spoil heaven. Christ says that your present condition nauseates him to positive sickness: "Because thou art neither cold nor hot. I will spew thee out of my mouth!" In the ruins of Pompeii there was found a petrified woman, who instead of trying to fly from the destroyed city, had spent her time in gathering up her jewels. She saved neither her life nor her jewels. There are multitudes making the same mistake. In trying to get earth and heaven they lose both. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." Be one thing or the other. Tread the earth like the lion, or mount the air like the eagle; for my text says: "Ye shall have in abomination among the fowls, the bat."

Again: taking the suggestion of the text, drive out the chameleon from your soul. There is some difference among good men as to the name of this creeping thing which God pronounced unclean, but I shall take the opinion which seems best suited to my purpose. The chameleon is a reptile, chiefly known by its changeableness of color, taking the color of the thing next to it, sometimes brown, sometimes red, and sometimes gray, but always the color of its surroundings, a type of that class of Christians who are now one thing in religious faith, and now another, just to suit circumstances, always taking their color of religious belief from the man they are talking to. They go to one place, and are firstrate Unitarians. "Jesus was a good man, but nothing more." They go to Princeton and they are Trinitarians, almost willing to die for the divinity of Jesus. Among the Universalists they refuse the idea of future punishment; and going among those of opposite belief, announce that there is a hell with a gusto that makes you think you are glad of it. Drive out that unclean chameleon from your soul. Do not be ever changing the color of your faith. My friends, liberal Christianity, falsely so-called, believes in nothing. God is anything you want to make him. The Bible is to be believed in so far as you like it. Heaven a grand mixing up of Neros and Pauls. The man who dies by suicide in his right mind in 1888, beating into glory by 10 years the Christian man who dies a Christian death in 1898; the suicide proving himself wiser than the Christian. Oh, my friends, let us try to believe in something. An infidel was called to the bedside of his daughter. The daughter said, "Father, which shall I believe, you or mother? Mother took the religion of Christ, and died in its embrace. You say that religion is a humbug. Now I am going to die, and I am very much perplexed; shall I believe you, or take the belief of my mother?" The father said, "Choose for yourself." She said, "No, I am too weak to choose for myself; I want you to choose for me." "Well," said the father, after much hesitation and embarassment, "Mary, I think you had better take the religion of your mother." The time will come when we shall have to believe in something. We cannot afford to be on the fence in religion. Truth and error are set opposite to each other. The one is infinitely right, and the other infinitely wrong. In the judgment day we must give an account of what we believed as well as for what we acted. The difference between believing truth and believing error is the difference between paradise and perdition. I beg you, in the light of the Bible, and on your knees before God, to form your religious opinion and then stick to it though business companions scoff, and wits caricature, and the air crackles with the fires of martyrdom. Surely truths in behalf of which Christ died, and angels of God trooped forth, and the whole universe is marshaled, are worth living for and worth dying for. Amidst the most unclean things is this ever-changing chameleon of religious theory. Away with the reptile! God abhors it with an all-consuming abhorrence.

Once more: take the suggestion of the text, and drive out the snail from your soul, God has declared it unclean. It is an animal to be found everywhere between the coldest North and the hottest South. There are 1,500 species of the snail. They have no backbone, and they are so slow that their movement is almost imperceptible. You see a snail in one place to-day; go to-morrow and you will find it has advanced only a few inches. It becomes an emblem of that large class of Christian people who go to work with a slowness and sluggishness that is wonderful. They are stopped by every little obstacle, because, like the snail, they have no backbone. Others mount up on eagle's wings, but they go at a snail's pace.

O child of God, arouse! We have apotheosized Prudence and Caution long enough. Prudence is a beautiful grace, but of all the family of Christian graces I like her the least, for she has been married so often to Laziness, Sloth and Stupidity. We have a million idlers in the Lord's vineyard who pride themselves on their prudence. "Be prudent," said the disciples of Christ, "and stay away from Jerusalem;" but he went. "Be prudent," said Paul's friends, "and look out for what you say to Felix;" but he thundered away until the ruler's knees knocked together. In the eyes of the world the most imprudent men that ever lived were Martin Luther, and John Oldcastle, and Wesley, and Knox. My opinion is that the most imprudent and reckless thing is to stand still. It is well to hear our commander's voice when he says "Halt!" but quite as important to hear it when he says "Forward!" This gospel ship, made to plough the seas at 15 knots an hour, is not making three. Sometimes it is most prudent to ride your horse slowly and pick out the way for his feet, and not strike him with the spurs; but when a band of Shoshonee Indians are after you in full tilt, the most prudent thing for you to do is to plunge in the rowels and put your horse to a full run, shouting: "Go 'long!" until the Rocky mountains echo it. The foes of God are pursuing us. The world, the flesh and the devil are after us; and our wisest course is to go ahead at swiftest speed.

When the Church of God gets to advancing too fast, it will be time enough to use caution. No need of putting on the brakes while going up hill. Do not let us sit down waiting for something "to turn up," but go ahead in the name of God, and turn it up. The great danger to the church now is not sensation but stagnation. Oh, that the Lord God would send a host of aroused and consecrated men to set the church on fire, and to turn the world upside down. Let us go to work and catch the last snail in our soul. With divine vehemence let us stamp its life out; for my text declares: "These also shall be unclean to you among the creeping things that creep upon the earth; the chameleon and the snail." I have thus tried to prejudice these Christian men and women against gloominess, and slander, and half-and-half experiences, and changeableness, and sloth. Our opportunities for getting better are being rapidly swallowed up in the remorseless past. This golden Sabbath is about to drop out of the calendar. This moment may we drive out all the unclean things from our souls—the vulture, and the bat, and the owl, and the chameleon, and the snail; and in place thereof bring in the Lamb of God, and the Dove of the Spirit! The case is urgent. Arouse! before it be eternally too late! "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it!"

Cigarettes and Throat-Cancer.

Since the death of Emperor Frederick, an active controversy has been carried on in Europe as to the effect of smoking upon the throat. The late Emperor was an habitual smoker; so was General Grant, and both of them died from cancer in the throat. Physicians attached to large hospitals mention other cases similar to theirs. Some attribute the throat disease to tobacco; others to the paper used in making cigarettes; others still to the heat of short pipes.

It has been shown, in the course of this discussion, that both the paper and the tobacco of some brands of cigarettes are drugged. A medical officer of the British army in Egypt certifies to the presence of opium in cigarettes of native Egyptian manufacture, and gives the reasons for this assertion. On buying cigarettes at Cairo and Alexandria, he was frequently asked whether he wished them highly or moderately flavored—that is, with much or little opium in them.

When we consider that cigarettes called "Egyptian" are a regular article of sale in every part of the world, we need not be at a loss to explain the strange symptoms and the lowered tone of health that often follow their use.

The London Times, which has published many comunications on this subjects, attempts an editorial summary of the arguments for and against the use of tobacco. Addressing a public of smokers, it does not bear on very hard in discountenancing the practice. It admits, in a mild way, the moral evil, resulting, such as "a lazy tolerance of evil, a certain flabbiness of character, a fear of responsibility, a shiftiness of purpose," which have of late years come into prominence among public men. The Times concludes by a question, which is just as pertinent on this side of the Alantic as on the other:

"Is it over-fanciful to suggest that such a decadence from the virtues by which our empire was won, and by which alone it can be maintained, may be, in some small measure, attributable to perpetual employment of a narcotic, which; on the very showing of its advocates and admirers, helps men to live in a fool's paradise, and to shut their eyes to facts which it would be unpleasant steadily to contemplate."—Youth's Companion.

The Modern Hercules.

Philadelphia Record.

Philadelphia can boast of modern Hercules in the person of George Soptman, a giant in muscle and stature. He stands six feet four and a-half in his stockings, measures fifty inches around his chest and weighs 273 pounds, scarcely an ounce of which is superfluous flesh. His proportions are admirable, and he has amazed many an athletic expert by his displays of strength.

Soptman recently paid a visit to a gymnasium on Arch street and gave an exhibition of what he could do. The pupils eyed him curiously when he picked up the 150 pound dumbbell and twirled it between his fingers as a dude might do with a bamboo cane.

When he stretched out his arm and asked all who could possibly do so to jump on his back, arms, shoulders and take a ride, eight sturdy and strong men complied with the request, holding on to his ears, hair and collar-button, they bore their weight upon him. He carried them without much difficulty, and the gymnasts who saw the performance were almost inclined to think contemptuously of their own comparatively puny physiques.

Not satisfied with this, the young giant went to the strength-testing scales and pulled up the 2,000-pound weight with ease. He then wrapped two straps around his shoulder and back, and, fastening the ends to 3,300 pounds of iron, he calmly raised the weight and took a promenade around the hall with his load.

Hypochondriacs.

A physician relates in the St Louis Globe-Democrat that many able members of the medical profession become "cranks" concerning their own health. "They exaggerate the slightest symptoms into dangerous cases. Most physicians are not competent to treat confirmed hypochondriacs. Medical students begin early to imagine themselves afflicted with the various diseases which they are studying. I remember when at college I had a roommate who became thoroughly hypoed after entering the course. One day he caught a cold, and that night informed me he believed he was going to die, as he was certain he was afflicted with a new malignant fever which he had been studing that day. I went immediately for one of the professors, and he not being in I had another one come. The second understood the case at once, and gave my friend some simple remedy, and later, the first came, and he, wishing to give the young man a lesson, had me administer a liberal dose of ipecac. This made him very sick, but cured him of the malignant feaver."

A Dinner to Suit.

That food has an effect on the mind and actions was believed in by Mossop, who always ordered his dinner to suit the character he was about to play. For Zanga, in the "Revenge," sausages; for Barbarossa, veal cutlets, and for Richard, pork.—Gentleman's Magazine.

MINNESOTA IN BRIEF.

A turkey buzzard flew against a show window in Duluth and destroyed $150 worth of plate glass.

Robert Arola, on trial at Fergus Falls, for killing his father, was insane. The verdict was expected.

A prairie fire overtook H. H. Sneppin while he was asleep in a ravine four miles from Hancock, and he was so badly burned that he died.

The grand jury at the last term of court in Nobles county recommended the county commissioners to provide for the building of a new court-house.

Malcolm McLaren, ex-sheriff of Crow Wing county, was bound over to the grand jury in $200 for an assault on Frank McKinster.

Judge Buckham of Faribault sentenced George Vosberg to five years and Louis Hopke to seven years' imprisonment at Stillwater. Vosberg and Hopke were convicted of setting fire to barns in Faribault.

Isaac Barstow, a prominent farmer of Grow, four miles north of Anoka, was burned out of house and home. He, with three small children, were sleeping in the house and had a narrow escape from a horrible death.

Messrs. Rice & Peck of Fort Benton, Mont., have brought 5,000 sheep to Fergus Falls, which they are feeding from the screenings which they buy from the mills. The poor wheat this year yields a large amount and makes cheap food.

Prof. J. H. Capper Hutchinson, of the Stillwater high school, who drowned a few days ago in Lake St. Croix, was engaged to Miss Mary L. Blanchard, assistant in the Hastings high school, and the two were to have been wedded early in the coming year.

John Joerger, Jr., who was sent from Red Wing to the state penitentiary last spring, being convicted of obtaining money under false pretenses, has been pardoned by the governor and released. At the time of his conviction many considered the sentence he received as too severe.

The hardware store of M. G. Peters at Mantorville was entered by burglars who took about $150 worth of goods. This is the third time this store has been burglarized within two years. The blacksmith shop of F. A. Brondson was broken open and a small steel crowbar taken which was found in the hardware store.

At the last council meeting of Mankato a committee was appointed to prepare revisions of certain portions of the charter for submission to the legislature. The contract system of making city improvements will be changed to the day labor system. A board of public works will be established, and probably two new wards, the Fifth and Sixth, will be asked for.

Robert Arola, the young Finlander who killed his father, near Fergus Falls will be taken to St. Peter at once. When Arola left Finland he was to marry a girl whom he was going to send for after he reached America. He sent her money to come, and after that he did not appear like the same man. It is believed now that Arola was hopelessly insane.

As the train on the Omaha line was at the union depot at Kasota one night, a demented man took possession of the telegraph office, and ran things to suit himself. A brakeman leaped upon his back, and he was overcome after a hard struggle. His name is Hill, and he was on his way to his home from the Rochester insane asylum.

Jim Hall, who has been running a barber shop at Caledonia for a year, was arrested by Detective Byrne of La Crosse on a warrant charging him with bigamy. Hall waived extradition papers, and was taken to La Crosse for trial. The complainant is his first wife. Sarah Carrigan, whom he married last June, but who has not lived with him. Two weeks ago he married Effie Carlisle of Brownsville.

An unknown man was found by the police back of the opera house at Brainerd with a gash from ear to ear, but not deep enough to be dangerous. In his hand was a razor, with which he had attempted to take his life. The man was unconscious from the loss of blood and the effects of whiskey. A railroad ticket from Tacoma to Chicago via Ashland was in his pocketbook. His name is supposed to be George Seibert.

It is surmised at St. Cloud that the letter reporting the suicide of John Pflum, the murderer of the widow Kometisch at Freeport, and the finding of his body by Anderson of Eagle Lake Todd county, is a fraud. It is suspected now that it was written by Pflum himself. It was written at Dagget's Brook, mailed at Brainerd, and Anderson gave his address as Eagle Lake. No one by that name is found there, and as Pflum started in that direction it is probable that he visited those localities and used an assumed name.

The Man Who Disguises His Signature.

From the Lincoln Journal.

If there is one man who deserves to be hanged without benefit of the clergy, it is the one who sends you a letter, requesting a reply, and signs his name with such a combination of insane flourishes that the prince of darkness wouldn't be able to read it. This man will frequently write very plainly from the beginning of a letter to the end, and then, taking it for granted that you are perfectly familiar with his name, get up on the pen and write it all over the bottom of the page, under the impression that he is appending his signature. A murrain on him and all his scurvy kind.

MAN AND HIS SHOES.

How much a man is like old shoes?
For instance, both a sole may lose;
Both have been tanned, both are made tight
By cobblers; both get left and right;
Both need a mate to be complete,
And both are made to go on feet;
They both need healing, oft are sold,
And both in time turn all to mold.
With shoes the last is first; with men
The first will be the last, and when
The shoes wear out they're mended now,
When men wear out they're men dead, too.
They both are trod upon, and both
Will tread on others, nothing loth;
Both have their ties, and both incline,
When polished, in the world to shine;
And both peg out—and would you choose
To be a man or be his shoes?

HUSBAND AND LOVER.

I was the daughter of a Memphis physician, and his only child. In my seventh year I lost my mother, but the poignancy of my childish grief was in some measure alleviated when six months later my father brought me a little playmate of my own age. She was his ward, and we grew from childhood to girlhood beneath the same roof and for my part I can say I loved Natalie Chester as a sister. How beautiful she was in the first flush of her peerless womanhood.

"I wonder will he be her latest conquest?" I asked myself, when for the first time Lindon Stafford and she stood face to face. He was my father's young assistant, and perhaps the only man she ever met who, who panoplied in the armor of a cold indifference, seemed insensible to her charms. And I know this indifference piqued a vanity that the flattery of many tongues had fanned into a passion.

"Does it not occur to you Myrtle," she said to me, one afternoon, "that our young doctor is a man of singularly plegmatic temperament?"

"He has never made love to you, Natalie," I answered dryly. "Yet it ought to be a novel sensation to meet a man who does not fall in love and worship you."

Her cheeks flushed slightly, but she retorted with a laugh: "Would it not be a more novel sensation still to constrain him into idolatry. They say that natures the least demonstrative are capable of the strongest feelings, and that the spark once applied to the latent fire you are treated to a conflagration."

She spoke lightly, but the glance that flashed from the dusky beauty of her eyes convinced me that if all the devices of a fascinating woman did not fail her she would bring Lindon Stafford to her feet. I, who watched Mr. Stafford keenly, saw that he was struggling with a passion that he felt would only bring him unhappiness. But the hour had come when strong men's souls would be tried in the crucible of a great affliction, and Lindon Stafford, standing face to face with uncompromising necessity, dare no longer fritter away existence in a dream of love. The terrible scourge of yellow fever had swept over Memphis, and within a week it presented all the appearance of a city of the dead. In their abject terror the people fled they cared not whither, and fear for the time being crushed all the nobler instincts of humanity from hearts where craven selfishness predominated. My father's first thought was for Natalie's safety and mine, and to this end he telegraphed to Miss Chester's other guardian, who was then a resident in a Northern State. In due time that gentleman arrived to carry his beautiful ward and me far from the reach of the impending danger, but no remonstrance, no entreaty could induce me to desert what I conceived to be my post of duty. Shall I ever forget that night when Natalie left us? Before bidding her good-by I had hurried upstairs for a parcel she had forgotten, and in returning in a minute or so to find Dr. Stafford in the room, I paused outside the door.

"I intended to say farewell," she said as, with downcast eyes, she held out her hand.

"You must think me very cowardly to flee from danger while Myrtle insists on remaining."

"Miss Craig's place is by her father's side," he answered; but it would be worse than madness in your friends to allow you to incur risks that could bring no possible good to any one. And then you are too young and beatiful to die."

"And if this parting should be forever what would you say to me, Mr. Stafford?"

"I would say farewell—only farewell," he replied, evasively, as he released her hand. Her eyes looked into his, and a cry escaped him as he caught her in his arms, and if a man's love ever went out to a woman it was in that lingering kiss he pressed upon her lips. I turned away, and, with trembling limbs and sinking heart, stole quietly upstairs. For I had learned to love this man even with a hopelessness that intensified a passion which had changed the current of my life into a channel whose source was bitterness and sorrow. I am not going to linger over the days that followed when, as a hospital nurse, I tried to forget my folly. Within two weeks the sommons came to the only one that loved me, and I was an orphan. Dr. Stafford was also stricken down, and I nursed him through his illness to recovery, and when the scourge at length had passed away, I found myself alone and almost friendless in the world. One day Lindon Stafford, while still pale and emaciated, came to me and asked me to be his wife. I knew too well he did not love me. I knew his every thought was with the beautiful Natalie in her Northern home; but, oh, my God! I could not let him leave me, and in the blind fatalism of a woman's love I cheated myself into the belief that in time I would win his heart. And so we were married and the bridal kiss he gave me, in its coldness, chilled my lips and heart. But I did not marry him to indulge in vain regrets and Lindon Stafford was too loyal a gentleman, too sensitive to truth and honor, to be other than the kindest husband. The first year of my wedded life was drawing to a close, when one morning I received a letter from Natalia. She was coming south with her guardian for the winter and would spend a day or two with us, she wrote. She remained a week with us—for me a week of mental torture, for, as I said, my husband lingered often by her side. I feared the smoldering fire of an unforgotten love had burned into a flame again within his breast.

It was Christmas eve, and Natalie kissed me in bidding me good-by. Oh! the treason of a woman's kiss to a woman, I thought, as I watched her dark eyes turned to my husband's face when he took his seat beside her in the carriage to leave her at the depot. Motionless and mute, as if grief had turned me to stone, I stood beside the window and looked out on the dismal street. And as the minutes passed this maddening thought occurred to me: Would my husband, the husband that I loved, desert me now for this beautiful Natalie; would his loyalty and honor be forgotten in an unholy passion? My hands and cheeks and brow were deathly cold, and yet my brain was on fire. The objects on the street had, to my vision, grown blurred and indistinct, and I turned to totter to a chair as Lindon noiselessly entered the room. There was a tender sadness in his eyes as he looked upon my pallid face, and with the sobbing cry of "Oh! husband, husband!" I sank into his outstretched arms.

"Myrtle, wife," said he, "when a year ago I stood before the altar and swore to love you until death there was a perjury upon my tongue. Even then an image that was not yours was enshrined within my heart, and the haunting eyes of Natalie Chester seemed to mock my firm resolve to be at east a faithful husband. You may have known my secret, poor patient wife, and yet reproach nor taunt has never passed your lips. Well, I've met Natalie Chester again to learn my passion was but a frenzy and had burnt itself to ashes. And now this Christmas Eve, sweet wife, when every heart throb that beats against your own is yours and only yours, I ask you to forgive me and forget the past, for I know such love as yours could pardon even a greater wrong."

I brushed the hair back from his splendid brow, and almost as shyly as a girl kissed his lips. In my husband I had found a lover at last.

BOSS TWEED AND HIS MEN.

Story of the Overthrow of the Tammany Ring.

Mr. L. J. Jennings, formerly connected with The New York Times, and now a member of parliament, recently related to a representative of The London World the story of his fight with Tammany.

"Before I had been at work very long in New York," says Mr. Jennings, "it struck me as a curious thing that none of the city accounts were ever published. There was a law requiring them to be issued quarterly and annually, but not a sign of them could I find anywhere. The taxation of the city amounted to £4,000,000 a year, and in the course of a few years a debt had been run up of over £20,000,000. There never was a city so badly lighted and paved. All the duties of city government were neglected. What, then, became of all the money? I set myself to work to find out. The city government was entirely in the hands of Boss Tweed and his merry men. They had yachts and fine carriages and fast trotters, and wore diamonds in their shirtfronts almost as large as saucers. A few years previously most of them had been unknown and penniless men. The police, the sheriffs, the whole control of the city, was in their hands. One day I managed to find out that a sum equal to £120,000 has been charged for carpets in a building known as the court-house. I went over the court-house and had a look round. There were no carpets there —only a little matting, which might have been bought for £20. Little by little I got at the secrets of the city account books. But I had nothing which could be produced in the shape of legal proof. The bold course was the only one to take. I 'asonished the city one morning by coming out with an article entitled 'Two Thieves.' I denounced Tweed and his confederates as public robbers. They abused me to their hearts' content in their newspapers; every crime I had ever heard of was laid at my door. I was arrested two or three times a day as the fight grew brisk; but the magistrates, albeit in the 'ring,' never refused bail, and there were gentlemen of the city who stood ready day and night to give bail for me to the extent of $5,000,000, had so much been wanted. I was 'waited for' as I went home at 2 or 3 in the morning, but somehow my kind friends always missed me. All kinds of inducements were offered me to 'shut up' and go away. One night a man came suddenly into my room at the office, shut the door quickly, and announced that he intended to cut the heart out of me. As you see I am here; therefore it stands to reason he did not do it. It is needless for me to dwell on little incicents of that kind. There was a well-known man who had once held an official position in the Tammany organization, but had been unfairly pushed out of it. He had a friend in the comptroller's office, where all the city books were kept. One night he came into my room, took his hat off, and remarked that it was very hot. 'Very,' I said. 'You have had a hard fight,' said he encouragingly. 'Have still, I think,' replied I, as I got up to look out of the window. The truth was that I felt unusually discouraged that night. There seemed to be no end to the long road I was on. 'I said you have had it,' said my acquaintance quietly, pulling out a roll of paper from his pocket. 'Here is the proofs,' he went on, 'of all the charges you have made—exact transcripts from the comptroller's book. The money stolen is over $20,000,000. Don't let the boys know that you have got those papers; they would murder you in a twinkling if they as much as suspected it.' I held out my hand for the inestimable roll, ran off home with it, and sat up all night disentangling the figures and puzzling out the whole story. The proof was ample, but it took me some days to bring it into a shape which would make its due impression on the public mind. The figures had been copied surreptitiously, at different times, and were all in chaos. Hundreds of thousands of dollars were charged to various persons who, I soon found, had no existence. A plasterer had been paid £366,000 for plastering one building. Furnishing that building had cost £1,500,000, although there were only a few stools and desks in the place. I need not tell you the details; suffice it to say that we got the corrupt judges impeached and removed from the bench; the 'boss' and his accomplices became fugitives, the entire ring was shattered to fragments.

GROVER'S LAST ONE.

President Cleveland Submits His Last Message for the Consideration of Congress.

He Touches at Length On the Widening Gulf Between Capital and Labor.

Reduction of the Revenue Advised —A Year of Tranquility With All Nations.

The Chinese Question—Treaties With Other Nations—The Nation's Pocketbook.

Consideration of Reports by the Various Heads of Departments —The Pension Question.

To the Congress of the United States: As you assemble for the discharge of the duties you have assumed as the representatives of a free and generous people, your meeting is marked by an interesting and impressive incident. With the expiration of the present session of the congress the first century of our constitutional existence as a nation will be completed. Our survival for one hundred years is not sufficient to assure us that we no longer have dangers to fear in the maintenance with all its promised blessings of a government founded upon the freedom of the people. The time rather admonishes us to soberly inquire whether in the past we have always kept in the course of safety, or whether we have before us a way, plain and clear, which leads to happiness, to perpetuity. When the experiment of our government was undertaken, the chart adopted for our guidance was the constitution, and departure from the lines there laid down is failure. It is only by a strict adherence to the direction they indicate, and by restraint within the limitations they fixed, that we can furnish proof to the world of the fitness of the American people for self-government. The equal and exact justice of which we boast as the underlying principle of our institutions should not be confined to the relations of our citizens to each other. The government itself is under bond to the American people, that in the exercise of its functions and powers it will deal with the body of our citizens in a manner scrupulously honest and fair, and absolutely just. It has agreed that shall be the only credential necessary to justify the claim of equality before the law and that no condition in life shall give rise to discrimination in the treatment of the apostle by the government. The citizen of our republic in its early day rigidly insisted upon full compliance with the letter of this bond, and saw stretching out before him a clear field for individual endeavor. His tribute to the support of his government was measured by the costs of its economical maintenance, and he was secure in the enjoyment of the remaining recompense of his steady life and contented with it. In those days the frugality of the people was stamped upon their government, and was enforced by the free, thoughtful and intelligent suffrage of the citizens. Combinations, monopolies and aggregations of capital were either avoided or sternly regulated and restrained. The pomp and glitter of governments less free offered no temptation and presented no delusion to the plain people who side by side in friendly competition wrought for the ennoblement and dignity of man, for the solution of the problem of free government and for the achievement of the grand destiny awaiting the land which God has given them. A century has passed; our cities are the abiding places of wealth and luxury; our manufacturers wield fortunes never dreamed of by the fathers of the republic; our business men are madly striving in the race for riches and immense aggregations of capital outrun the imagination in the magnitude of their undertakings. We view with pride and satisfaction this bright picture of our country's growth and prosperity. While only a closer scrutiny develops a somber shading, upon more careful inspection we find the wealth and luxury of our cities mingled with poverty and wretchedness and unremunerative toil. A crowded and constantly increasing urban population suggests the impoverishment of rural sections and discontent with agricultural pursuits. The farmer's son, not satisfied with his father's simple and laborious life, joins the larger chase for easily acquired wealth.

CAPITAL AND LABOR.

Through Combinations of Capital the Gulf Between Employers and Employes Is Widening.

We discover that the fortunes realized by our manufacturers are no longer solely by reward of sturdy industry and enlightened foresight, but that they result from the discriminating favor of the government and are largely built upon undue exactions from the masses of our people. The gulf between the employers and the employed is constantly widening and classes are rapidly forming, one comprising the very rich and powerful, while in another are found the toiling poor. As we view the achievement of aggregated capital we discover the existence of trusts, combinations and monopolies, while the citizen is struggling far in the rear or is trampled to-day beneath an iron heel. Corporations, which should be the carefully restrained creatures of the law and the servants of the people, are fast becoming the people's masters. Still, congratulating ourselves upon the wealth and prosperity of our country and complacently contemplating every incident of change inseparable from these conditions, it is our duty as patriotic citizens to inquire at the present stage of our progress how the bond of the government made with the people has been kept and performed. Instead of limiting the tribute drawn from our citizens to the necessities of its economical administration the government persists in exacting from the substance of the people millions which, unapplied and useless, lie dormant in its treasury. This flagrant injustice and this breach of faith and obligation add to extortion the danger attending the diversion of the currency of the country from the legitimate channels of business. Under the same laws by which these results are produced, the government permits many millions more to be added to the cost of the living of our people and to be taken from our consumers, which unreasonably swell the profits of a small but powerful minority. The people must still be taxed for the support of the government under the operation of tariff laws. But to the extent that the mass of our citizens are inordinately burdened beyond any useful public purpose and for the

the government, under pretext of an exercise of its taxing power, enters gratuitously into partnership with these favorites to their advantage and to the injury of a vast majority of our people. This is not equality before the law. The existing situation is injurious to the health of our entire body politic. It stifles in those all patriotic love of country and substitutes in its place selfish greed and grasping avarice. Devotion to American citizenship for its own sake and for what it should accomplish as a motive to our nation's advancement and the happiness of all our people, is displaced by the assumption that the government, instead of being the embodiment of equality, is but an instrumentality through which especial and individual advantages are to be gained. The arrogance of this assumption is unconcealed. It appears in the sordid disregard of all but personal interests in the refusal to abate, for the benefit of others, one iota of selfish advantage, and in combinations to perpetuate such advantages through efforts to control legislation and improperly influence the suffrages of the people. The grievance of those not included within the circle of these beneficiaries when fully realized, will surely arouse irritation and discontent. Our farmers, long suffering and patient, struggling in the race of life with the hardest and most unremitting toil, will not fail to see in spite of misrepresentations and misleading fallacies that they are obliged to accept such prices for their products as are fixed in foreign markets where they compete with the farmers of the world; that their lands are declining in value while their debts increase, and that without compensating favor they are forced by the action of the government to pay for the benefit of others such enhanced prices for the things they need that the scanty returns of their labor fail to furnish their support or leave no margin for accumulation. Our workingmen, enfranchised from all delusions and no longer frightened by the cry that their wages are endangered by a just revision of our tariff laws, will reasonably demand through such revision steadier employment, cheaper means of living in their homes, freedom for themselves and their children from the doom of and an open door to their advancement beyond the limits of a laboring class. Others of our citizens whose comforts and expenditures are measured by moderate salaries and fixed incomes will insist upon the fairness and justice of cheapening the cost of necessaries for themselves and their families. When to the selfishness of the beneficiaries of unjust discrimination under our laws there shall be added the discontent of those who suffer from such discrimination, we will realize the fact that the beneficent purposes of our government, dependent upon the patriotism and contentment of our people, are endangered. Communism is a hateful thing and menace to peace and organized government. But the communism of combined wealth and capital, the outgrowth of overweening cupidity and selfishness, which insidiously undermines the justice and integrity of free institutions, is not more dangerous than the communism of oppressed poverty and toil, which, exasperated by injustice and discontent, attacks with wild disorder the citadel of rule. He mocks the people who proposes that the government shall protect the rich, and that they in turn will care for the laboring poor. Any intermediary between the people and their government, or the least delegation of the care and protection the government owes to the humblest citizen in the land makes the boast of free institutions a glittering delusion and the pretended boon of American citizenship a shameless imposition. A just and sensible revision of our tariff laws should be made for the relief of those of our countrymen who suffer under present conditions. Such a revision should receive the support of all who love that justice and equality due to American citizenship, of all who realize that in this justice and equality our government finds its strength and its power to protect the citizen and his property, of all who believe that the contented competence and comfort of many accord better with the spirit of our institutions than colossal fortunes unfairly gathered in the hands of a few, of all who appreciate that the forbearance and fraternity among our people which recognize the value of every American interest are the surest guaranty of our national progress, and of all who desire to see the products of American skill and ingenuity in every market of the world with a resulting restoration of American commerce.

REDUCTION OF REVENUE.

This Question Touched Upon, as Is Also Pensions, the Indians and Government Buildings.

The necessity of the reduction of our revenue is so apparent as to be generally conceded, but the means by which this end shall be accomplished and the sum of direct benefit which shall result to our citizens present a controversy of the utmost importance. There should be no scheme accepted as satisfactory by which the burdens of the people are only apparently removed. Extravagant appropriations of public money, with all their demoralizing consequences, should not be tolerated either as a means of relieving the treasury of its present surplus or as furnishing pretexts for resisting a proper reduction in tariff rates. Existing evils and injustice should be honestly recognized, boldly met and effectively remedied. There should be no cessation of the struggle, until a plan is perfected fair and conservative toward existing industries, but which will reduce the cost to consumers of the necessaries of life, while it provides for our manufacturers the advantage of freer raw materials and permits no injury to the interests of American labor. The cause for which the battle is waged is comprised within lines clearly and distinctly defined. It should never be compromised. It is the people's cause. It cannot be denied that the selfish and private interests which are so persistently heard when efforts are made to deal in a just and comprehensive manner with our tariff laws are related to, if they are not responsible for, the sentiment largely prevailing among the people that the general government is the fountain of individual private aid; that it may be expected to relieve with paternal care the distress of citizens and communities, and that from the fullness of its treasury it should, upon the slightest possible pretext of promoting the general good, apply public funds to the benefit of localities and individuals. Nor can it be denied that there is a growing impression that, as against the government and in favor of private claims and interests, the usual rules and limitations of business principles and just dealings should be waived. These ideas have been, unhappily, much encouraged by legislative acquiescence, and relief from contracts made with the government is too easily accorded in favor of the citizen; the failure to support

CLAIMS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT

by proof is often supplied by no better consideration than the wealth of the government and the poverty of the claimant; gratuities in the form of pensions are granted upon no other real ground than the needy condition of the applicant or for reasons less valid, and large sums are expended for the purpose of public buildings and other improvements upon representations carefully claimed to be related to public needs and necessities. The extent to which such matters subordinate and postpone action upon subjects of great public importance but involving no special private or partisan interest, should arrest attention and lead to reformation. A few of the numerous illustrations of this condition may be stated. The crowded condition of the calendar of the supreme court, and the delay to suitors and denial of justice resulting therefrom, has been strongly urged upon the attention of the congress, with a plan for the relief of the situation approved by those well able to judge of its merits. While this subject remains without effective consideration many laws have been passed providing for the holding of terms of inferior courts at places to suit the convenience of localities, or to lay the foundation of an application for the erection of a new public building. Repeated recommendations have been submitted for the amendment and change of the laws relating to our public lands, so that converting them to other uses than for homes of honest settlers might be prevented. While a measure to meet this conceded necessity of reform remains awaiting the action of congress many claims to the public lands and applications for their donation in favor of states and individuals have been allowed. A plan in aid of Indian management, recommended by those well informed as containing valuable features in furtherance of the solution of the Indian problem, has thus far failed of legislative sanction, while grants of doubtful expediency to railroad corporations, permitting them to pass through Indian reservations, have greatly multiplied. The propriety and necessity of the erection of one or more prisons for the confinement of United States convicts and a postoffice in the national capital are not disputed, but these needs yet remain unanswered while scores of public buildings have been erected where their necessity for public purposes is not apparent. A revision of our pension laws could easily be made which would rest upon just principles and provide for every worthy applicant. But while our general pension laws remain confused and imperfect hundreds of our private pension laws are annually passed which are the sources of unjust discrimination and popular demoralization. Appropriation bills for the support of the government are defaced by items and provisions to and it is freely asserted by responsible and experienced parties that a bill appropriating money for public internal improvement would fail to meet with favor unless it contained in it more for local and private advantage than for public benefit. These statements can be much emphasized by an ascertainment of the proportion of federal legislation which either bears upon its face its private character, or which, upon examination, develops such a motive power, and yet the people wait and expect from their chosen representatives such patriotic action as will advance the welfare of the entire country; and this expectation can only be answered by the performance of public duty with unselfish purpose. Our mission among the nations of the earth and our success in accomplishing the work God has given the American people to do require of those intrusted with the making and execution of our laws perfect devotion above all other things to the public good. This devotion will lead to strongly resist all impatience of constitutional limitations of federal power and to persistently check the increasing tendency to extend the scope of federal legislation in the domain of state and local jurisdiction upon the plea of subserving the public welfare. The preservation of the partition between proper subjects of federal and local care and regulations of such importance under the constitution, which is the law of our very existence, that no consideration of expediency of sentiment should tempt us to enter upon doubtful ground. We have undertaken to discover and proclaim the richest blessings of the government with the constitution as our guide. Let us follow the way it points out. It will not mislead us, and surely no one who has taken upon himself the solemn obligations to support and preserve the constitution can find justification or solace for disloyalty in the excuse that he wandered and disobeyed in search of a better way to reach the public welfare than the constitution offers. What has been said is deemed not inappropriate at a time when, from a century's height, we view the way already trod by the American people, and attempt to discover their future path. The seventh president of the United States—the soldier and statesman, and at all times the firm and brave friend of the people—in vindication of his course as the protector of the popular right and the champion of true American citizenship, declared: "The ambition which leads me on is anxious desire and fixed determination to restore to the people unimpaired the sacred trust they have confided to my charge; to heal the wounds of the constitution and to preserve it from further violation; to persuade my countrymen, so far as I may, that it is not in a splendid government, supported by powerful monopolies and aristocratical establishments, that they will find happiness or their liberties protected, but in a plain system void of pomp; protecting all and granting favors to none; dispensing its blessings like the dews of heaven unseen and unfelt, save in the freshness and beauty they contribute to produce. It is such a government that the genius of our people requires, such a one only under which our states may remain for ages to come, united, prosperous and free."

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

A Year of Tranquillity With All Nations—The Fisheries Question and Coast Boundary.

In pursuance of a constitutional provision requiring the president from time to time to give to the congress information of the state of the Union, I have the satisfaction to announce that the close of the year finds the United States in the enjoyment of domestic tranquillity and at peace with all the nations. Since my last annual message our foreign relations have been strengthened and improved by performance of international good offices and by new and renewed treaties of amity, commerce and reciprocal extradition of criminals. Those international questions which still await settlement are all reasonably susceptible of amicable settlement, and there is no existing subject of dispute between the United States and any foreign power that is not susceptible of satisfactory adjustment by frank diplomatic treatment. The questions between the United States and Great Britain relating to the rights of American fishermen under treaty and international comity in the territorial waters of Canada and New England, I regret to say, are not satisfactorily adjusted. These matters were fully treated in my message to the senate of Feb. 20, 1888, together with a convention called under my authority with her majesty's government on the 15th of February last for the removal of all causes of misunderstanding, and were submitted by me for the approval of the senate. This treaty having been rejected by the senate, I transmitted a message to the congress on the 23d of August last, reviewing the transactions and submitting for consideration certain recommendations for legislation concerning the important questions involved. Afterward on the 12th of September in response to a resolution of the senate, I again communicated fully all the information in my possession as to the action of the government of Canada affecting the commercial relation between the dominion and the United States, including the treatment of American fishing vessels in the ports and waters of British North America. The communications have all been published, and therefore opened to the knowledge of both houses of congress, although two were addressed to the senate alone. Comment upon, or repetition of their contents would be superfluous, and I am not aware that anything has since occurred which should be added to the facts therein stated. Therefore, I merely repeat, as applicable to the present time, the statement which will be found in my message to the senate of Sept. 27, last, that since March 3, 1887, no case has been reported to the department of state wherein complaint has been made of unfriendly or unlawful treatment of American fishing vessels on the part of the Canadian authorities, in which reparation was not promptly and satisfactorily obtained by the United States consul general at Halifax. Having essayed the discharge of my duty to procure by negotiation the settlement of a long standing cause of dispute, and to

to the good relations of the two countries, and continuing to the opinion that the treaty of February last, which failed to receive the approval of the senate, did supply a satisfactory, practical and final adjustment upon a basis honorable and just to both parties of the difficulty and vexed question to which it related; and having subsequently and unavailingly recommended other legislation to congress, which I hoped would suffice to meet the exigency created by the rejection of the treaty, I now again invoke the earnest and immediate attention of the congress to the condition of this important question as it now stands before them and the country, and for the settlement of which I am deeply solicitous. Near the close of the month of October last occurrences of a deeply regrettable nature were brought to my knowledge, which made it my painful but imperative duty to obtain with as little delay as possible a new personal channel of diplomatic intercourse in this country with the government of Great Britain. The correspondence in relation to this incident will in due course of time be laid before you, and will disclose the unpardonable conduct of the official referred to in his interference by advice and counsel with the suffrages of American citizens in the very crisis of the presidential election then near at hand; and also in his subsequent public declarations to justify his action, superadding impugnment of the executive and senate of the United States in connection with important questions now pending in controversy between the two governments. The offense thus committed was most grave, involving disastrous possibilities to the good relations of the United States and Great Britain, constituting a great breach of diplomatic privilege and an invasion of the purely domestic affairs and essential sovereignty of the government to which the envoy was accredited. Having first fulfilled the just demands of international comity by affording full opportunity for her majesty's government to act in relief of the situation, I considered prolongation of discussion to be unwarranted, and thereupon declined to further recognize the diplomatic character of the person whose continuance in such function would destroy the mutual confidence which is essential to the good understanding of the two governments, and was inconsistent with the welfare and self-respect of the government of the United States. The usual interchange of communication has since continued through her majesty's legation in this city. My endeavors to establish by international co-operation measures for the prevention of the extermination of fur seals in Behring sea have not been relaxed; and I have hopes of being enabled shortly to submit an effective and satisfactory conventional project with the maritime powers for the approval of the senate.

THE COAST BOUNDARY

between our Alaskan possessions and British Columbia, I regret to say, has not received the attention demanded by its importance, and which on several occasions heretofore I have had the honor to recommend to the congress. The admitted impracticability, if not impossibility, of making an accurate and precise survey and demarkation of the boundary line as it is recited in the treaty with Russia under which Alaska was ceded to the United States renders it absolutely requisite for the prevention of national jurisdictional complications that adequate appropriation for a reconnoissance and survey to obtain proper knowledge of the locality and the geographical features of the boundary should be authorized by congress with as little delay as possible. Knowledge to be thus obtained is an essential prerequisite for negotiation for ascertaining a common boundary or as preliminary to any other mode of settlement. It is much to be desired that some agreement should be reached with her majesty's government by which the damage to life and property on the great lakes may be alleviated by removing or humanely regulating the obstacles to reciprocal assistance to wrecked or stranded vessels. The act of June 19, 1878, which offers to Canadian vessels free access to our inland waters in aid of wrecked or disabled vessels has not yet become effective through concurrent action by Canada. The due protection of our citizens of French origin or descent, from claim of military service in the event of their returning to or visiting France, has called forth a correspondence which was laid before you at the last session. In the absence of conventional agreement as to naturalization, which is greatly to be desired, this government sees no occasion to recede from the sound position it has maintained, not only with regard to France, but as to all countries with which the United States have not concluded special treaties.

Twice within the last year has the imperial household of Germany been visited by death, and I have hastened to express the sorrow of this people, and their appreciation of the lofty character of the late aged Emperor William and their sympathy with the heroism under suffering of his son, the late Emperor Frederick. I renew my recommendation of two years ago for the passage of a bill for the refunding to certain German steamship lines of the interest upon tonnage dues illegally exacted.

On the 12th of April last I laid before the house of representatives full information respecting our interests in Samoa; and in the subsequent correspondence on the same subject, which will be laid before you in due course, the history of events in these islands will be found.

TREATIES.

The Chinese Question Considered and Treaties With Other Powers Touched Upon.

In a message accompanying my approval on the first day of October last, of a bill for the exclusion of Chinese laborers, I laid before congress full information and all correspondence touching the negotiation of the treaty with China concluded at this capital on the 12th day of March, 1888, and which, having been confirmed by the senate with certain amendments, was rejected by the Chinese government. This message contained a recommendation that a sum of money be appropriated as compensation to Chinese subjects who have suffered injuries at the hands of lawless men within our jurisdiction. Such appropriation has been duly made, and the fund awaits reception by the Chinese government. It is sincerely hoped that by the cessation of the influx of this class of Chinese subjects, in accordance with the expressed wish of both governments, a cause of unkind feeling has been permanently removed. On the 9th of August, 1887, notification was given by the Japanese minister at the capital of the adjournment of the conference for the revision of the treaties of Japan with foreign powers, owing to the objection of the government to the provision in the draft for a jurisdictional convention which required the submission of the criminal code of the empire to the powers in advance of its becoming operative. This notification was, however, accompanied with an assurance of Japan's intention to continue the work of revision, notwithstanding this temporary interruption of negotiations. It is hoped that improvements may soon be secured in the jurisdictional system as regards foreigners in Japan and relief afforded to that country from the present undue and oppressive foreign control in matters of commerce. I earnestly recommend that relief be provided for the injuries accidentally caused to Japanese subjects in the island Ikisima by the target practice of one of our vessels. A diplomatic mission from Corea has been received and the formal intercourse between the two countries contemplated by the treaty of 1882 is now established.

LEGISLATIVE PROVISION

is hereby recommended to organize and equip consular courts in Corea. Persia has established diplomatic representations at this capital, and has evidenced very great interest in the enterprise and achievements of our citizens. I am, therefore, hopeful that beneficial commercial relations between the two countries may be brought about.

I announce with sincere regret that Hayti has again become the theater of insurrection, disorder and bloodshed. The titular government of President Saloman has been forcibly withdrawn and he driven out of the country to France, where he has since died. The tenure of power has been so unstable amid the war of factions that has ensued since the expulsion of President Saloman, that no government constituted by the Haytian people has been recognized as administering responsibly the affairs of that country. Our representative has been instructed to abstain from interference between the warring factions, and a vessel of our navy has been sent to Haytian waters to sustain our minister and for the protection of the persons and property of American citizens. Due precautions have been taken to enforce our neutrality laws and prevent our territory from becoming the base of military supplies for either of the warring factions. Under color of a blockade of which unreasonable notice had been given, and which does not appear to have been efficiently maintained, a seizure of vessels under the American flag has been reported, and in consequence measures to prevent and redress any molestation of our innocent merchantmen have been adopted. Proclamation was duly made on the 9th day of November, 1887, of the conventional extensions of the treaty of June 3, 1875, with Hawaii, under which relations of such special and beneficent intercourse have been created. In the vast field of Oriental commerce now unfolded from our Pacific borders no feature presents stronger recommendations for congressional action than the establishment of communication by submarine telegraph with Honolulu. The geographical position of the Hawaiian group, in relation to our Pacific states, creates a national interdependency and mutuality of interests which our present treaties were intended to foster and which make close communication a logical and modern necessity. The wisdom of concluding a treaty of commercial reciprocity with Mexico has been heretofore stated in my messages to congress, and the lapse of time and growth of commerce with that close neighbor and sister republic confirm the judgment so expressed. The precise relocation of our boundary line is needful, and adequate appropriation is now recommended.

THE MEXICAN BOUNDARY.

It is with sincere satisfaction that I am able to advert to the spirit of good neighborhood and friendly co-operation and conciliation that has marked the correspondence and action of the Mexican authorities in their share of the task of maintaining law and order about the line of our common boundary.

The long-pending boundary dispute between Costa Rica and Nicaragua was referred to my arbitration, and by an award made on the 22d of March last, the question has been finally settled to the expressed satisfaction of both parties in interest.

The emperor of Brazil, in abolishing the last vestige of slavery among Christian nations, called forth the earnest congratulations of this government in expression of the cordial sympathies of our people. The claims of nearly all other countries against Chili, growing out of her late war with Bolivia and Peru, have been disposed of either by arbitration or by a lump settlement. Similar claims of our citizens will continue to be urged upon the Chilian government, and it is hoped will not be subject to further delays. A comprehensive treaty of amity and commerce with Peru was proclaimed on Nov. 7 last; and it is expected that under its operation mutual prosperity and good understanding will be promoted. In pursuance of the policy of arbitration a treaty to settle the claim of Santos, an American citizen, against Ecuador has been concluded under my authority, and will be duly submitted for the approval of the senate. Like disposition of the claims of Carlos Butterfield against Denmark, and of Van Bokelen against Hayti, will probably be made, and I trust the principle of such settlements may be extended in practice under the approval of the senate. Through unforeseen causes foreign to the will of both governments the ratification of the convention of Dec. 5, 1885, with Venezuela for the rehearing of the of the United States under the treaty of 1866 failed to exchange within the term provided, and a supplementary convention, further extending the time for exchange of ratifications and explanatory of an ambiguous provision of the prior convention, now awaits the advice and consent of the senate. Although this matter in the stage referred concerns only the concurrent treaty-making power of one branch of congress, I advert to it in view of the interest repeatedly and conspicuously shown by you in your legislative capacity in favor of a speedy and equitable adjustment of the questions growing out of the discredited judgments of the previous mixed commission of Caracas, with every desire to do justice to the representation of Venezuela. In this regard the time seems to have come to end this matter, and I trust the prompt confirmation by both parties of the supplementary action referred to will avoid the need of legislation or other action to prevent the longer withholding of such rights of actual claimants as may be shown to exist. As authorized by the congress preliminary steps have been taken for the assemblage at this capital during the coming year of the representatives of South and Central American states, together with those of Mexico, Hayti and San Domingo to discuss sundry important monetary and commercial topics. Excepting in those cases where from reasons of contiguity of territory and the existence of a border line incapable of being guarded, reciprocal commercial treaties may be found expedient. It is believed that commercial policies inducing freer mutual exchange of products can be most advantageously arranged by independent but co-operative legislation. In the mode last mentioned the control of our taxation for revenue will always be retained in our own hands, unrestricted by conventional agreements. With the government's conformity, also with congressional authority, the maritime powers have been invited to confer in Washington in April next upon the practicability of devising uniform rules and measures for the greater security of life and property at sea. A disposition to accept on the part of a number of the powers has already been manifested, and if the co-operation of the nations chiefly interested shall be secured important results may be confidently anticipated. The act of June 26, 1884, and the acts amendatory thereof, in relation to the tonnage duties have given rise to extended correspondence with foreign nations with whom we have existing treaties of navigation and commerce, and have caused a wide, regretable divergence of opinion in relation to the imposition of the duties referred to. These questions are important and I shall make them a subject of a special and more detailed communication at the present session.

CITIZENSHIP.

Rapid Increase in Immigration Demands Revision of the Naturalization Laws.

With the rapid increase of immigration to our shores and the facilities of modern travel abuses of the generous privileges afforded by our naturalization laws call for their careful revision. The easy and unguarded manner in which certificates of American citizenship can now be obtained has induced a class unfortunately large to avail themselves of the opportunity to become absolved from allegiance to their native land and yet by a foreign residence to escape any just duty and contribution of service to the country of their proposed adoption. Thus, while evading the duties of citizenship to the United States, they may make prompt claim for its national protection and demand its intervention in their behalf. International complications of a serious nature arise, and the correspondence of the state department discloses the great number and complexity of the questions which have been raised.

Our laws regulating the issue of passports should be carefully revised and the institution of a central bureau of registration at the capital is again strongly recommended. By this means full particulars of each case of naturalization in the United States would be secured and properly indexed and recorded, and thus many cases of spurious citizenship would be detered and unjust responsibilities would be avoided. The reorganization for the consular service is a matter of serious importance to our national interests. The number of existing principal consular offices is believed to be greater than at all necessary for the conduct of the public business. It should not be our policy to maintain more than a moderate number of principal offices, each supported by a salary sufficient to enable the incumbent to live in comfort and so distributed as to secure the convenient supervision through subordinate agencies of affairs over a considerable district. I repeat the recommendations heretofore made by me that the appropriation for the maintenance of our diplomatic and consular service should be recast; that the so-called notarial or unofficial fees which our representatives abroad are now permitted to treat as personal perquisites should be forbidden; that a system of consular inspection should be instituted, and that a limited number of secretaries of legation at large should be authorized.

Preparations for the centennial celebration on April 30, 1889, of the inauguration of George Washington as president of the United States at the city of New York have been made by a voluntary organization of the citizens of that locality, and, believing that an opportunity should be afforded for the expression of the interest felt throughout the country with this event, I respectfully recommend fitting and co-operate action by congress on behalf of the people of the United States.

THE NATION'S POCKETBOOK.

Review of the Financial Condition of the Country—Revenue and Surplus.

The report of the secretary of the treasury exhibits in detail the condition of our national finances and the operations of the several branches of the government related to his department. The total ordinary revenues of the government for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1888, amounted to $379,266,074.76, of which $219,091,173.63 was received from customs duties, and $124,296,871.98 from internal revenue taxes. The total receipts from all sources exceeded those for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887, by $7,862,797.10. The ordinary expenditures of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, were $259,653,958.67, leaving a surplus of $119,612,116.09. The decrease in these expenditures as compared with the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887, was $8,278,220.30, notwithstanding the payment of more than $5,000,000 for pensions in excess of what was paid for that purpose in the latter mentioned year. The revenues of the government for the year ending June 30, 1889, ascertained for the quarter ending Sept. 30, 1888, and estimated for the remainder of the time, amount to $377,000,000, and the actual and estimated ordinary expenditures for the same year are $274,000,000, leaving an estimated surplus of $104,000,000. The estimated receipts for the year ending June 30, 1890 are $377,000,000, and the estimated ordinary expenditures for the same time are $275,467,488.34, showing a surplus of $101,232,511.66. The foregoing statements of surplus do not take into account the sum necessary to be expended to meet the requirements of the sinking fund act, amounting to more than $47,000,000 annually. The cost of collecting the customs revenue for the last fiscal year was 2.44 per cent; for the year 1885 it was 3.77 per cent. The excess of taxes was collected during the last fiscal year over those collected for the year ended June 30, 1887, was $5,489,174.26, and the cost of collecting this revenue decreased from 3.4 per cent in 1887 to less than 3.2 per cent for the last year. The tax collected on oleomargarine was $723,948.04 for the year ending June 30, 1887, and $864,139.88 for the following year. The requirements of the sinking fund act have been met for the year ending June 30, 1888, and for the current year also by the purchase of bonds. After complying with this law, as positively required, and bonds sufficient for that purpose had been bought at a premium, it was not deemed prudent to further expend the surplus in such purchases until the authority to do so should be more explicit. A resolution, however, having been passed by both houses of congress, removing all doubt as to executive authority, daily purchases of bonds were commenced on the 23d day of April, 1888, and have continued until the present time. By this plan bonds of the government not yet due have been purchased up to and including the 30th of November, 1888, amounting to $94,700,400; the premium paid thereon amounting to $17,508,613.08. The premium added to the principal of these bonds represents an investment yielding about 2 per cent interest for the time they still had to run, and the saving to the government represented by the difference between the amount of interest at 2 per cent upon the sum paid for principal and premium and what it would have paid for interest at the rate specified in the bonds if they had run to their maturity is about $27,165,000. At first sight this would seem to be a profitable and sensible transaction on the part of the government, but, as suggested by the secretary of the treasury, the surplus thus expended for the purchase of bonds was money drawn from the people in excess of any actual need of the government, and was so expended rather than allow it to remain idle in the treasury. If this surplus, under the operation of the

had been left in the hands of the people, it would have been worth in their business at least 6 per cent per annum. Deducting from the amount of interest upon the principal and premium of these bonds for the time they had to run at the rate of 6 per cent, the saving of 2 per cent made for the people by the purchase of such bonds, the loss will appear to be $55,760,000. This calculation would seem to demonstrate that if excessive and unnecessary taxation is continued, and the government is forced to pursue this policy of purchasing its own bonds at the premiums which it will be necessary to pay, the loss to the people will be hundreds of millions of dollars. Since the purchase of the bonds was undertaken as mentioned, nearly all that have been offered were at last accepted. It has been made quite apparent that the government was in danger of being subjected to combinations to raise their price, as appears by the instance cited by the secretary of the offering of bonds of the par value of only $326,000 so often that the aggregate of sums demanded for their purchase amounted to more than $19,700,000. Notwithstanding the large sums paid out in the purchase of bonds, the surplus in the treasury on the 4th day of November, 1888, was $52,234,610.01. After deducting about $20,000,000 just drawn out for the payment of pensions, at the close of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887, there had been coined under the compulsory silver coinage act $266,988,280 in silver dollars, $55,504,310 of which were in the hands of the people. On the 30th of June, 1888, there had been coined $299,708,790, and of this $55,829,303 was in circulation in coin, and $200,387,376 in silver certificates for the redemption of which silver dollars to that amount were held by the government. On the 30th day of November, 1888, $312,570,990 had been coined; $60,970,990 of the silver dollars were actually in circulation, and $237,418,346 in certificates. The secretary recommends the suspension of the further coinage of silver, and in such recommendation I earnestly concur. For further valuable information and timely recommendations I ask the careful attention of congress to the secretary's report.

ARMY AND NAVY.

Quotation From the Secretaries' Reports—Death of Gen. Sheridan—The Indians.

The secretary of war reports that the army of the date of the last consolidated returns consisted of 2,189 officers and 24,549 enlisted men. The actual expenditures of the war department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1888, amounted to $41,165,107.07, of which sum $9,158,516.63 was expended for public works, including river and harbor improvements. "The board of ordnance and fortification," provided for under the act approved Sept. 22 last, was convened Oct. 30, 1888, and plans and specifications for procuring forgings for 8, 10 and 12-inch guns under provision of section 4, and also for procuring 12-inch breech-loading mortars, cast-iron, hooped with steel, under the provisions of section 5 of the said act, were submitted to the secretary of war for reference to the board by the ordnance department of the same date.

These plans and specifications having been promptly approved by the board and the secretary of war, the necessary authority to publish advertisements inviting proposals throughout the country was granted by the secretary on Nov. 12, and on Nov. 13 the advertisements were sent out to the different newspapers designated. The bids for the steel forging are to be opened on Dec. 20, 1888, and for the mortars on Dec. 15, 1888. A board of ordnance officers was convened at the Watervliet arsenal on Oct. 4, 1888, to prepare the necessary plans and specifications for the establishment of an army gun factory at that point. The preliminary report of this board, with estimates for ship building and officers' quarters, was approved by the board of ordnance and fortifications Nov. 6 and 8. The specifications and form of advertisement and instructions to bidders have been prepared, and advertisements inviting the proposals for the excavation for the

and for erecting the two sets of officers' quarters have been published. The detailed drawings and specifications for the gun factory building are well in hand, and will be finished within three or four months, when bids will be invited for the erection of the building. The list of machines, etc., is made out, and it is expected that the plans for the large lathes, etc., will be completed within about four months, and after approval by the board of ordnance and fortification bids for the furnishing of the same will be invited. The machines and other fixtures will be completed as soon as the shop is in readiness to receive them—probably about 1890. Under the provisions of the army bill for the procurement of pneumatic dynamite guns the necessary specifications are now being prepared, and advertisements for proposals will issue early in December. The guns will probably be of fifteen inches caliber and fire a projectile that will carry a charge each of about five hundred pounds of explosive gelatine with full caliber projectiles. The guns will probably be delivered in from six to ten months from the date of the contract, so that all the guns of this class that can be procured under the provisions of the law will be purchased during the year 1889. I earnestly request that the recommendations contained in the secretary's report, all of which are in my opinion calculated to increase the usefulness and discipline of the army, may receive the consideration of the congress. Among these the proposal that there should be provided a plan for the examination of officers, to test their fitness for promotion, is of the utmost importance. This reform has been before recommended in the reports of the secretary, and its expediency is so fully demonstrated by the arguments in its favor that its adoption should no longer be neglected.

THE DEATH OF GEN. SHERIDAN

in August last was a national affliction. The army then lost the grandest of its chiefs. The country lost a brave and experienced soldier, a wise and discreet commander and a modest and sensible man. Those who in any manner came within the range of his personal association will never fail to pay deserved and willing homage to his greatness and the glory of his career, but they will cherish with more tender sensibility the loving memory of the simple, generous and considerate nature.

The Apache Indians, whose removal from their reservation in Arizona followed the capture of those of their number who engaged in a bloody and murderous raid during a part of the years 1885 and 1886, are now held as prisoners of war at Mount Vernon barracks in the State or Alabama. They numbered on the 31st day of October, the date of the last report, 83 men, 170 women, 70 boys and 59 girls, in all 383 persons. The commanding officer states that they are in good health and contented, and that they are kept employed as fully as is possible under the circumstances. The children, as they arrive at a suitable age, are sent to the Indian schools at Carlisle and Hampton. Last summer some charitable and kind people asked permission to send two teachers to these Indians for the purpose of instructing the adults, as well as such children as should be found there. Such permission was readily granted, accommodations were provided for the teachers, and some portions of the buildings at the barracks were made available for school purposes. The good work contemplated has been commenced, and the teachers engaged are paid by the ladies with whom the plan originated. I am not at all in sympathy with those benevolent but injudicious people who are constantly insisting that these Indians should be returned to the reservation. Their removal was an absolute necessity if the lives and property of citizens upon the frontier are to be at all regarded by the government. Their continued restraint at a distance from some of their repeated and cruel murders and outrages is still necessary. It is a mistaken philanthropy, every way injurious, which prompts the desire to see these savages returned to their old haunts. They are in their present location as the result of the best judgment of those having official responsibility in the matter and who are by no means lacking in kind consideration for the Indians. A number of these prisoners have forfeited their lives to outraged law and humanity. Experience has proved that they are dangerous and cannot be trusted. This is true not only of those who, on the war path, have heretofore been actually guilty of murder, but of their kindred and friends who, while they remained upon their reservation, furnished aid and comfort to those absent with bloody intent. The prisoners should be treated kindly and kept in restraint far from the locality of their former reservation, and they should be subjected to efforts calculated to lead to their improvement and to the softening of their savage and cruel instincts, but their return to their old home should be persistently resisted. The secretary, in his report, gives a graphic history of these Indians and recites with painful vividness their bloody deeds and the unhappy failure of the government to manage them by peaceful means. It will be amazing if a perusal of this history will allow the survival of a desire of the return of these prisoners to their reservation upon sentimental or other grounds.

THE NAVY.

The report of the secretary of the navy demonstrates very intelligent management in that important department, and discloses the most satisfactory progress in the work of reconstructing the navy made during the past year. Of the ships in course of construction five, viz.: The Charleston, Baltimore, Yorktown, Vesuvius and the Petrel have in that time been launched and are rapidly approaching completion, and in addition to the above the Philadelphia, the San Francisco, the Newark, the Bennington, the Concord and the Herreshoff torpedo boat are all under contract for delivery to the department during the next year. The progress already made and being made gives good ground for the expectation that these eleven vessels will be incorporated as part of the American navy within the next twelve months. The report shows that notwithstanding the large expenditures for new construction and the additional labor involved the total ordinary or current expenditure of the department for the three years ending June 30, 1888, are less by more than 20 per cent than such expenditures for the three years ending June 30, 1884. The various steps which have been taken to improve the business methods of the business department are reviewed by the secretary. The purchasing of supplies has been consolidated and placed under a responsible bureau head. This has resulted in the curtailment of open purchases, which in the years 1884-85 amounted to over 50 per cent of the purchases of the department, to less than 11 per cent, so that at the present time about 90 per cent of the total departmental purchases are made by contract and after competition. As the expenditures on that account exceed an average of $2,000,000 annually, it is evident that an important improvement in the system has been inaugurated and substantial economies introduced.

THE MAIL POUCH.

Growth of the Postal Business Demands a Readjustment of the Machinery—Postal Conventions.

The report of the postmaster general shows a marked increase of business in every branch of the postal service. The number of postoffices on July 1, 1888, was 57,376, an increase of 6,124 in three years, and of 2,219 for the last fiscal year. The latter mentioned increase is classified as follows: New England states, 5; Middle states, 181; Southern states and Indian Territory (41), 1,406; the states and territories of the Pacific coast, 190; the ten states and territories of the West and Northwest, 435; District of Columbia, 2; total, 2,219. Free delivery offices have increased from 189 in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887, to 358 in the year ended June 30, 1888. In the railway mail service there has been an increase in one year of 168 routes, and in the number of miles traveled per annum an increase of 150,795,917.48; the estimated increase of railroad service for the year was 6,000 miles, but the amount of new railroad service actually put on was 12,761.50 miles. The volume of business in the money order divisions, including transactions in postal notes, reached the sum of upwards of $143,000,000 for the year. During the past year parcel post conventions have been concluded with the Barbadoes, the Bahamas, British Honduras and Mexico, and are now under negotiation with all the Central and South American states. The increase of correspondence with foreign countries during the past three years is gratifying, and is especially notable and exceptional with the Central and South American states and with Mexico. As the greater part of mail matter exchanged with these countries is commercial in its character, this increase is evidence of the improved business relations with them. The practical operation of the parcel post conventions so far as negotiated has served to fulfill the most favorable predictions as to their benefits. In July last a general postal convention was negotiated with the Dominion of Canada, which went into operation on March 1, and which practically makes one postal territory of the United States and Canada. Under it merchandise and parcels may now be transmitted through the mails at fourth-class rates of postage. It is not possible here to touch even the leading heads of the great postal establishment to illustrate the enormous and

or of the needs for legislative readjustment of much of its machinery that it has outgrown. For these and valuable recommendations of the postmaster general attention is earnestly invited to his report. A department whose revenues have increased from $19,772,000 in 1870 to $52,700,000 in 1888, despite reductions of postage, which have enormously reduced rates of revenue while greatly increasing its business, demands the careful consideration of the congress as to all matters suggested by those familiar with its operations and which are calculated to increase its efficiency and usefulness. A bill proposed by the postmaster general was introduced at the last session of the congress by which a uniform standard in the amount of gross receipts would fix the right of a community to a public building to be erected by the government for postoffice purposes. It was demonstrated that aside from the public convenience and the promotion of harmony among citizens, invariably disturbed by changes of leasings and of site, it was a measure of the highest economy and of sound business judgment. It was found that the government was paying in rents at the rate of from 7 to 10 per cent per annum on what the cost of such public buildings would be. A very great advantage resulting from such a law would be the prevention of a large number of bills constantly introduced for the erection of public buildings at places, and involving expenditures not justified by public honesty. I trust that this measure will become a law at the present session of congress. Of the total number of the postmasters 54,874 are of the fourth class. These, of course, receive no allowances whatever for expenses in the service, and their compensation is fixed by percentage on the receipts of their respective offices. This rate of compensation may have been, and probably was at some time, just. But the standard has remained unchanged through the several reductions in the rates of postage. Such reductions have necessarily cut down the compensation of these officials, while it undoubtedly increased the business performed by them. Simple justice requires attention to this subject, to the end that may receive at least an equivalent to that which the law, itself fixing the rate, intended for them. Another class of postal employes whose condition seems to demand legislation is that of clerks in postoffices, and I call especial attention to the report and recommendations of the postmaster general for their classification. Proper legislation of this character for the relief of carriers in the free delivery service has been frequent. Provision is made for their promotion; for substitutes for them on vacation; for substitutes for holidays and limiting their hours of labor. Seven million dollars has been appropriated for the current year to provide for them, though the total number of offices where they are employed is but 358 for the past fiscal year, with an estimated increase for the current year of but forty, while the total appropriation for all clerks in offices throughout the United States is $5,950,000. The legislation affecting the relations of the government with railroads is in need of revision. While for the most part the railroad companies throughout the country have cordially co-operated with the postoffice department in rendering excellent service, yet, under the law as it stands, while the compensation to them for carrying the mail is limited and regulated, and although railroads are made post roads by law, there is no authority reposed anywhere to compel the owners of a railroad to take and carry the United States mail. The only alternative provided by act of congress in case of refusal is for the postmaster general to send mail forward by pony express. This is but an illustration of ill-fitting legislation, reasonable and proper at the time of its enactment, but long since outgrown and requiring readjustment. It is gratifying to note from the carefully prepared statistics accompanying the postmaster general's report that, notwithstanding the great expansion of the service, the rate of expenditure has been lessened, and efficiency has been improved in every branch, that fraud and crime have decreased, that losses from the mails have been reduced, and that the number of complaints of the service made to postmasters and to the department are far less than ever before.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Recommendations of the Attorney General Concurred In—The Latter Day Saints.

The transactions of the department of justice for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1888, are contained in the report of the attorney general as well as a number of valuable recommendations, the most of which are repetitions of those previously made and ought to receive consideration. It is stated in this report that, though judgments in civil suits amounting to $552,021.08 were recovered in favor of the government during the year, only the sum of $132,934 was collected thereon, and that, though fines, penalties and forfeitures were imposed amounting to $541,808.43, only $109,648.42 of that sum was paid on account thereof. These facts may furnish an illustration of the sentiment, which extensively prevails, that a debt due the government should cause no inconvenience to the citizen. It appears from this report that, though prior to March, 1885, there had been but six convictions in the Territories of Utah and Idaho under the laws of 1862 and 1882, punishing polygamy and unlawful cohabitation and crime, there have been since that date nearly six hundred convictions under these laws and the statutes of 1887, and the opinion is expressed that under such a firm and vigilant execution of these laws and the advance of ideas opposed to the forbidden practices, polygamy within the United States is virtually at an end. Suits instituted by the government under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, for the termination of the corporations known as the Perpetual Emigrating Fund company and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, have resulted in a degree favorable to the government, declaring the charters of these corporations forfeited and escheating their property. Such property, amounting in value to more than $800,000, is in the hands of a receiver, pending further proceedings, an appeal having been taken to the supreme court of the United States.

PUBLIC DOMAIN.

Disposition of Public Lands—Railroad Grants—Attempt to Solve the Indian Problem.

In the report of the secretary of the interior, which will be laid before you, the condition of the various branches of our domestic affairs connected with that department and its operations during the past year are fully exhibited. But a brief reference to some of the subjects discussed in this able and interesting report can here be made, but I commend the entire report to the attention of the congress, and trust that the sensible and valuable recommendations it contains will secure careful consideration. I cannot too strenuously insist upon the importance of proper measures to insure a right disposition of our public lands, not only as a matter of present justice, but in the forecast of the consequences to future generations. The broad, rich acres of our agricultural plains have been long preserved by nature to become her untrammeled gifts to a people civilized and free, upon which should rest in well distributed ownership the numerous homes of enlightened, equal and fraternal citizens. They came to the national possession with the warning example in our eyes of the entail of iniquities in landed proprietorship which other countries have permitted and still suffer. We have no excuse for the violation of principles cogently taught by reason and by example, nor for the allowance of pretexts which have sometimes exposed our lands to colossal greed. Laws which open the door to fraudulent acquisition or an administration which permits favor to the rapacious seizure by a favored few of expanded areas that many should enjoy are accessory to offenses against our national welfare and humanity not to be too severely condemned or punished. It is gratifying to know that something has been done at last to redress the injuries to our people and check the perilous tendency of the reckless waste of national domain; that over eighty million acres have been wrested from illegal usurpers, improvident grants and fraudulent entries and claims to be taken for the

although less than the greater areas thus unjustly less lost, must afford a profound gratification to right feeling citizens. As it is a recompense for the labors and struggles for the recovery, our dear experience ought sufficiently to urge the speedy enactment of measures of legislation which will confine the future disposition of our remaining agricultural lands to the uses of actual husbandry and general homes. Nor should our vast tracts of so-called desert lands be yielded up to the monopoly of corporations or grasping individuals, as appears to be much the tendency under the existing statutes. These lands require but the supply of water to become fertile and productive. It is a problem of great moment how most wisely for the public good that factor shall be furnished. I cannot but think it perilous to suffer either these lands or the sources of their irrigation to fall into the hands of monopolies which, by such means, may exercise lordships over areas dependent on their treatment for productiveness. Already steps have been taken to secure accurate and scientific information of the conditions, which is the prime basis of the intelligent action. Until this shall be gained the course of wisdom appears clearly to be in a suspension of further disposal, which only promises to create rights antagonistic to the common interest. No harm can follow this cautionary conduct. The land will remain and the public good presents no demand for hasty dispossession of national ownership and control. I commend also the recommendations that appropriate measures be taken to complete the adjustment of the various grants made to the states for internal improvements and of swamp and overflowed lands, as well as to adjudicate and finally determine the validity and extent of the numerous private land claims. All these are elements of great injustice and peril to the settlers upon the localities affected, and now that their existence is more pressing measures should be taken to fix as soon as possible their bounds and terminate the threats of trouble which arise from uncertainty. The condition of our Indian population continues to improve, and the proofs multiply that the transforming change so much to be desired, which shall substitute for barbarism enlightment and civilizing education, is in favorable process. Our relations with these people during the year have been disturbed by no serious disorder, but rather marked by a better

REALIZATION OF THEIR TRUE INTERESTS

and increasing confidence and good will. These conditions testify to the value of the higher tone of consideration and humanity which has governed the latter methods of dealing with them and I commend its continued observance. Allotments in severalty have been made on some reservations until all those entitled to land thereon have have had their shares assigned, and the work is still continued. In directing the execution of this duty I have not aimed so much at rapid dispatch as to secure just and fair arrangements which shall best conduce to the objects of the law, by producing satisfaction with the results of the allotments made. No measure of general effect has ever been entered on from which more may be fairly hoped if it shall be discreetly administered. It proffers opportunity and inducement to that independence of spirit and life which the Indian peculiarities needs, while at the same time the inalienable right of title affords security against the risks his inexperience of affairs or weakness of character may expose him to in dealing with others. Whenever begun upon any reservation it should be made complete, so that all are brought to the same condition, and as soon as possible community in lands should cease by opening such as remain unallotted to settlement. Contact with the ways of industrious and successful farmers will, perhaps, add a healthy emulation which will both instruct and stimulate, but no agency for the amelioration of this people appears to me so promising as the extension, urged by the secretary, of such complete facilities of education as shall, at the earliest possible day, embrace all teachable Indian youths of both sexes, and retain them with a kindly and beneficent hold until their characters are formed and their faculties and dispositions trained to the pursuits of some form of useful industry. The capacity of the Indian

NO LONGER NEEDS DEMONSTRATION.

It is established; it remains to make the most of it, and when it shall be done the curse will be lifted, the Indian race saved and the sin of their oppression redeemed. The time of its accomplishment depends upon the spirit and justice with which it shall be prosecuted. It cannot be too soon for the Indian, nor for the interests and good name of the nation. The average attendance of Indian pupils in the schools increased by over 900 during the year and the total enrollment reached 15,212. The cost of maintenance was not materially raised. The number of teachable Indian youth is now estimated at 40,000, or nearly three times the enrollment of the schools. It is believed the obstacles in the way of instructing all are surmountable and that the necessary expenditure would be a measure of economy. The Sioux tribes on the great reservation of Dakota refused to assent to the act passed by the congress at its last session for opening a portion of their lands to settlement, notwithstanding modification of the terms was suggested which met most of their objections. Their demand is for immediate payment of the full price of $1.25 per acre for the entire body of land, the occupancy of which they are asked to relinquish. The manner of submission insured their fair understanding of the law, and their action was undoubtedly as thoroughly intelligent as their capacity admits. It is at least gratifying that no reproach of over-reaching can in any manner lie against the government, however advisable the favorable completion of the negotiation may have been esteemed. I concur in the suggestions of the secretary regarding the Turtle Mountain Indians, the two reservations in California and the Crees. They should, in my opinion, receive immediate attention.

Perhaps the most important appointive office for the farmer is that of railroad commissioner, and that class should have a representation on the Board. They have had one in the person of John L. Gibbs, one of the most progressive, practical farmers of the state, one who was appointed by the urgent request of leading practical farmers of the state. Mr. Gibbs has been active and earnest in the behalf of the farmers of the state, to the extent of his power under the laws, ever ready to listen to each and every complaint that they have to make. We learn that certain railroad men will bring to bear the weight of their power against Mr. Gibbs' re-appointment, but this consideration will not weigh a feather with Governor Merriam, who will, so far as he is able, consult their interests in the matter. Within the last four or five weeks we have interviewed many of our leading farmers as to who they would like to have compose the Board of Railroad and Warehouse Commissioners, and one of the names proposed in every case was that of Farmer Gibbs. Farmers will consult their own interests if they would write to Governor elect Merriam requesting that Mr. Gibbs be retained upon the Board. Then, when the Legislature is convened they should insist upon such amendments of the laws as should confer upon the Board greater powers, in accordance with suggestions that have been made by Mr. Gibbs. It is not reasonable to suppose that every member of the Board shall be a farmer, but they should have one representative, at least, and in the whole state a more faithful, competent and honest farmer does not exist than is Farmer John L. Gibbs. That he should be retained, if he wants it, is but an act of simple justice to the farmers of Minnesota and to an efficient official who has faithfully discharged every known duty.

The Senatorship.

Every newspaper is having its say nowadays upon this important topic, and everybody else is thinking about it. Unfortunately, (perhaps) the people cannot express their opinion direct, by ballot, but must trust this important business with their representatives but base indeed would be that representative who should act directly in opposition to the wishes of his constituents. The great and growing interests of the Northern part of the State require a man from among us but the situation is such that it is probably impossible for us to obtain that man. What then is our imperative duty? It is to unite upon the next best man offered, no matter from what portion of the State, what city, village or hamlet he hails from, if he be broad enough, and deep enough to represent the interests of every section equally without being influenced by interests of his own locality that may clash with ours. In view of the fact of very important railroad interests looking in our direction the people of this country cannot afford to make any mistakes in this important mattes and our representatives should BE ABSOLUTELY SURE that the man whom they support for senator has no entangling alliances with other interests antagonistic to ours, that would lead him to overlook us entirely or to neglect to pay sufficient attention to our needs. For the purpose of obtaining the prize, perhaps some might make any kind of a promise, which promise might well be taken with a grain of allowance if he was so surrounded by counter influences as to make it probable that his future actions would all be in their behalf. The question is one of so great importance that we cannot afford to waste any maudling sentiment in the matter. A candidate may be ever so able, ever so competent, but if we have reason to suppose that other influences will be such that he will be liable to help others before he does us we ought to have nothing to do with him. We want a man whose personal interests are clearly identical with ours; if we can't have that man we want the one whose interests are nearest. We cannot afford to make any mistakes in this matter of so great importance to us.

For Chairman.

The Board of Railroad and Warehouse Commissioners is one of great importance to the farmers of this state and it should be formed solely in accordance with their wishes, composed of good and true men who know and feel the needs of the farmers. Hon. John L. Gibbs is a farmer, has been for two years a member of the board and should be retained as chairman of the board. Thus would the farmers secure not only a good board but the most important possition upon it.

COUNTY NEWS.

From the Thirteen Towns

W. E. Kelsey, of Crookston, he that is temptation proof, spent several days in this city and vicinity this week looking after the interests of the farmers who are always glad to see his genial and smiling countenance.

John McLean and Joseph Laurence, of the hardware firm of Sewart & Laurence, of Crookston, spent two days the past week looking us over with a view to investing in lumber and wood. Both expect to return in the near future.

Hon. E D. Childs, of Carman, was a guest at the Belmont Tuesday. During his stay here he made a complete tour of the city, visiting our lumber yards saw mills, flour mills and different business houses, and left favorable impressed with the future greatness of "The City on the Hill."

Senator Marcus Johnson, and A. D. Stevens, of Cookston, two of the proprietors of the new townsite, spent a couple of days in the city this week looking over their recent purchase, with a view of making some important improvements there on. It was the senator's first visit to the city and he expressed himslf as being greatly surprised at finding such a large town here, and to see so many different industrial enterprises here and said that Fosston was bound to be one of the most important commercial centers in the Northwest.

The Minneapolis & Northern and Red River Valley elevators commenced to buy wheat this morning, and the market opened with $1.01 for No. 1 hard. The receipts were larger than was expected and a number of loads of No. 1 hard was recived.

O. A. E. Blyberg, of Pelican Rapids, a member of the firm of Hillestad & Blyberg of this place is in the city. This is his first visit here for two years, and to say that he was surprised at the change that had taken place during that time, and the evidence of prosperity and industrial growth that confrented him on all sides, but feebly expressed it.

Ten Indians from White Earth reservation, with loads of wheat to have ground into flour at the new roller mill, were up on Wednesday, and said if satisfaction was given, the entire grain raised on the reservation would be ground at this mill. They seem well pleased with the looks of the flour and the treatment received from the mill proprietors. In speaking of the country tributary to Fosston from which trade will be drawn, White Earth reservation is generally overlooked by outsiders, but it will constitute a trade whose importance cannot be overestimated.

Dr. A. H. Dunlop, of Crookston, spent several days in the city the past week looking after his patients and visiting friends. The doctor says he always likes to come to Fosston, because the people are so hospitable and sociable that a stranger can't help but feel at home among them. The doctor is only one out of the hundreds of strangers that are constantly coming and going that give expression to the same ideas.

East Grand Forks Courier: The labors of each successive grand jury in Polk County would be tame and common place were it not for East Grand Forks. At every session of that august body this city stands pre-eminently first with a long list of irregularities which need investigation. Among those of our citizens subpœned to appear before the grand jury this week were W. C. Nash, Peter Gilley, Dan Reynolds, Jas. McIlraith, Geo. K. Chambers, Dennis Dwyer, Geo. H. Barlow and H. W. Buntock. If the grand jury remains in session much longer there will scarcely be left an able-bodied man in the city.

Kittson County Enterprise: This week Mr. L. N. Eklund, one of Kittson County's most respected citizens takes his departure, for a time at least, for a warmer clime. During the past two years he has felt that the winters were a little too severe for his health, and necessitated a change, and for that reason leaves his business wholly in charge of his brother, A. M. Eklund, who is one of the firm of Eklund Bros., and will try a change of climate, and it is the hope of his friends here that the change may prove beneficial, and he can again return to our midst in restored health. On Tuesday evening a banquet was given in honor of him in Hotel Hallock. Also, prior to his departure, Capt. Vanstrum, who is an adept at anything he undertakes, presented Mr. Eklund, in behalf of the business men of Hallock, with a beautiful gold headed cane with the following inscription, "L. N. Eklund from his Hallock friends, Dec. 6th, 1888." There is one thing a certainty that wherever Mr. Eklund goes he will always have a reminder of the esteem with which he is held in the home he is now about to leave. He will be accompanied by L. W. Bristol, who has for several years been a prominent and respected citizen of our place, and the two will prospect for a time, ere their family's will join them. The final leave taking from our midst of two such men with their wives, is what our people deplore, as their places cannot be filled.

A Just Demand.

Verndale Journal.

The principal candidates for speakership of the house this winter appear to be Col. C. H. Graves, of Duluth, and D. F. Morgan, of Albert Lea, Freeborn County. It is worthy of notice that Hon. J. L. Gibbs of Freeborn County was the speaker four years ago, and so far as the question of locality comes in, it can hardly appear to the members of the house a fair thing that this same county should have it again so soon. The republican members of the house are going to settle this question, and they should carefully consider the claims of this republican stronghold, Northern Minnesota, and should see that it is wise, from a party standpoint, to deal fairly by our people. Although we have few votes in the legislature now, owing to the unjust failure to reapportion the state at the last session, After the next census Northern Minnesota will be a power, and will not fail to remember fair treatment, if it is accorded her a this time, nor the manifestation of a mean and selfish spirit, if that is unfortunately the chosen course in this coming session.

Col. Graves represents alone eight counties, with about 75,000 people, and was elected by a majority of over 5,000. We invite a comparison between this and all other districts in the state. If we had our proper representation, five or six representatives would sit in the house next winter from these counties, and the twenty-five counties of Northern Minnesota now entitled to but ten seats in the house would have at least thirty. We should not then be obliged to beg for recognition, but now we do appeal for it on the grounds of justice and wise political action. It is fortunate that the candidate of Northern Minnesota is so well known, and withal so capable. He will make a thoroughly able and honest speaker, as everyone admits. Now, if the republicans of Northern Minnesota are to feel that they are welcome in the party and the people here are to feel that they are sometimes recognized by the state at large, this is the time to show it.

An Unfortunate Death.

Grand Forks Herald: This morning Conductor Jerry Murphy of the M. & M. met with a fatal accident at Rolla, on the Cando branch of the road. He was coupling cars when in some manner he got between the draw heads just as the cars came together. The draw heads hit him just above the stomach crushing him in a fearful manner. Death resulted instantly. Conductor Murphy is well known in Grand Forks having formerly run a freight train on this division. He was one of the oldest and most popular employees on the road and was a general favorite with officials and traveling men with whom he came in contact. What makes the death even more sad is that he was shortly to be married. Jerry will be mourned by hosts of friends.

Important to Lumbermen, and Others Employing Men in Camps.

I am instructed to ask your immediate attention to the necessity of knowing that the men you employ this winter are thoroughly protected by vaccination against small pox. This disease is again prevailing in places adjacent to the lines of travel both in Canada and the United States. It was brought directly through the Canadian quarantine to a township in this state last August, and resulted in eight cases and three deaths. To avoid the terrible experience of a few years ago, vaccination is the sure safeguard. It is as much for the benefit of the men as for yourselves and the people at large. To be safe, therefore, re-vaccinate every one who has not had a successful vaccination within the last five years, and can show a good scar as evidence thereof.

Your foremen should keep a list of the men, in this respect, and should be on their guard against any eruptive disease appearing among them. Instruct them to isolate any one suspicious symptoms, with their clothing and bedding, till a medical opinion, or sufficient time shall develop their true character. I will advise any one of them, promptly, who will write me for the puryose, and will be obliged for the earliest information of anything suspicious, that we may give assistance where needed.

Will you please acknowledge receipt of this circular and give your co-operation to the plan here suggested?

Address, Respectfully yours,
CHARLES N. HEWITT, M. D.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

CROOKSTON, MINN., DECEMBER 13.

The Farm Hand.

Northwestern Agriculturist: It is with a large class of mechanics. They have learned to do one thing—and that rather carelessly—and are not disposed to seek occasions to diversify their labor or increase their knowledge. The greatest reason why farmers seeking to stock and seed their farms is the lack of good, wide awake reliable hands to work and care for stock and property. The eight hours per day system is creeping gradually to the farms, and the English servant system, of only one occupation for each hand, is increasing. The writer knows it used to be the practice of not only the "hand" but of the farmer himself to work not only "eight hours," nor from "sun to sun" but from "dawn to dark," and then milk the cows and feed the pigs afterwards. But the editor of an exchange who lived and served on a farm in those days described the perfect farm hand thus: He was no specialist. He could do anything. He was smart with a scythe, handy with a hoe, cute with a cradle and experienced with an ax. He knew how much grain and grass seed were required to the acre, when grass was fit to cut, and when it was hayed enough to "go in," and he did not need to be told when to drop turnip seed in the corn field or how to put corn in the shock. He could build walls, make cider, shingle the barn, make a hay rack or doctor a sick hog. I was safe to leave him to work alone. And he got for his services $10, $12, possibly $15 a month for eight months, and saved three-fourths of it. Then, when he had worked eight or ten seasons and accumulated a few hundred dollars, he probably married the hired girl, who had been at work for a dollar a week and saved half of that, bought a farm, got out of debt little by little, educated his children and sent them to the city to preach or practice law, or work in the store or shop, while he stayed on the old homestead.

Water as a Beverage.

Says Emory A. Storrs: How do you expect to improve on the beverage furnished by nature? Here it is—Adam's ale—about the only gift that has descended undefiled from the Garden of Eden! Nature's common carrier—not created in the rottenness of fermentation, nor distilled over guilty fires! Not born among the hot and noxious vapors and gases of worms and retorts, confined in reeking vats, placed in clammy barrels and kegs, stored in malarious cellars full of rats and cobwebs! No adulteration fills it with sulphuric acid, spirits of nitre, stramonium, other deadly drugs and poisons, until it is called "forty-rod-death," and "bug-juice," "fusel oil," and "Jersey lightning!" It is not kept standing in the fumes of sour beer and sour tobacco smoke in saloons, exposed for weeks and months before it is drank to the odor of old cigar stubs and huge spittoons. Virtues and not vices are its companions.

Does it cause drunkenness, disease, death, cruelty to women and children? Will it place rags on the person, mortgages on the stock, farm and furniture? Will it consume wages and income in advance and ruin men in business? No! But it floats in white gossamar clouds in the white summer sky, and hovers in dreamy mist over the merry faces of our sparkling lakes. It veils the woods and hills and vales of earth's landscapes in a purple haze, where filmy lights and shadows drift hour after hour. It piles itself in masses of cloud domes and thunder heads, draws the electric flash from its mysterious hiding-places, and seams and shocks the wide air with vivid lines of fire. It is carried by kind winds and falls in rustling curtains of liquid drapery over all the thirsty woods and fields, and fixes in God's mystic eastern heavens his beautiful bow of promise, glorified with a radiance that seems reflected out of heaven itself. It gleams in the frost crystals of the mountain tops and the dews of the valleys. It silently creeps up to each leaf in the myriad forests of the world and tints each fruit and flower. It is here in the grassblades of the meadows, and there where the corn waves its tassels and the wheat is billowing! It gems the depths of the desert with its glad, green oasis, winds itself in oceans round the whole earth, and roars its hoarse, eternal anthems on a hundred thousand miles of coast! It claps its hands in the flashing wave-crests of the sea, laughs in the little rapids of the brooks, kisses the dripping, moss-covered, old oaken well bucket in a countless host of happy homes.

See these pieces of cracked ice, full of prismatic colors, clear as diamonds! Listen to their tinkling against the brimming glass, that sweetest music in all the word to one half fainting with thirst? And so, in the language of that grand old man, Gough, I ask you, brothers all, would you exchange that sparkling glass of water for alcohol, the drink of the very devil himself?

Breed and Richness of Milk.

Northwestern Agriculturist.

Prof. Armsby, of Pennsylvania Agriculturist college draws the following conclusions on the subject of breed controling the richness of milk:

1. The quality of milk which a cow canproduce depends upon her breed and individuality, and, in this sense, the quality of the milk is more dependent upon breed than upon feed. On the other hand, the quality of milk which any given cow will produce is largely dependent upon her feed.

2. By feeding rich foods, the proportion of butter-fat in milk can be increased. The bulk of cream obtained is dependent upon so many other circumstances than feeding, that it affords no safe guide as to the real effects of the latter.

3. The standard rations given for the feeding of dairy cows, presuppose that the animals are good of their kind. On the other hand, the standards are not sufficiently exact to admit of modification for each breed of cows. The feeding standards are intended simply as guides to rational feeding, to be modified in each particular case, as experience may show to be necessary.

Division of Farm Work.

Massachusetts Ploughman: On a farm, as everywhere else, work should be properly divided, so that the weight of the burden should not be borne by any one person. There must be some deviation from the plan after it is made, but the endeavor should be to leave no work for anybody and all work for somebody. It seems to be everywhere the case that some will perform no labor unless forced to do so, while others are always looking for something to do and performing the task for others. In this way important matters are neglected—some should-be-workers are permitted to become shirks, and others are made drudges. The several tasks to be done should be daily assigned by the father and mother with the most perfect justice, avoiding giving the disagreeable tasks invariably to the child that has no choice but obedience, and cherishes in his heart, "When I am a man I'll get out of all this; I will go as far from a farm as possible." On the other hand, as carefully, refuse to perform all disagreeable duties personally to save the child. It is equally necessary to be just is assigning work to hired help. It should be generally understood that the agreeable and disagreeable tasks are each to be justly shared, and the moment that is done, trouble is at an end. Each feels that it is fair that he should perform his share of those duties that he dislikes doing, and each knows that tasks agreeable to him are equally so to others, and gladly divides his pleasures. If there is to be anything like an uneven division, let the shirks fare the worst. Always make certain that it is not a natural taste for the work that cannot be overcome, or an avoiding of labor, because of real lack of health and strength. Nowhere else is there greater need of the "pull all together" principle than on the farm. Success is assured only when mutual interest and responsibility is felt, and each takes his share of the work, performing it cheerfully.

Northwestern Agriculturist: The man who wants a first-class dairy must make up his mind to pay big prices for cows, or raise them himself. A good cow is a gold mine to a knowing dairyman, and he parts with her only for an equivalent in cash. Of course, there are farmers who have fine cows and do not know it, and from such a shrewd buyer, who knows what he wants, may pick upbargains, but most good dairy herds are bred by their owners, who study their cows, weed out poor ones, and breed for the special purpose of milk and butter production.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, County of Polk.—ss.
In Probate Court. Special term, November 30th, 1888.

In the matter of the estate of William Gendron deceased.

Whereas, An instrument in writing, purporting to be the last will and testament of William Gendron deceased, late of said county, has been delivered to this court.

And whereas, Nederic Gendron and Mely Gendron have filed therewith their petition, representing, among other things, that said William Gendron died in said county on the 22d day of June 1888, testate, and that said petitioners are the sole executors named in said last will and testament, and praying that the said instrument may be admitted to probate, and that letters testamentary be to them issued thereon.

The Dairy.

The National Stockman.

The grain in butter that is now demanded by the best paying consumer is not a peculiarity that can be fed into or bred into a cow. It is simply skill on the part of the butter maker in so churning as to free the butter from the buttermilk and incorporating the salt without breaking the natural globules of fat. This is easily accomplished by chilling the butter just as the buttermilk appears by adding a couple of gallons of water cold enough to reduce the temperature of the contents of the churn to 55 degrees or a little below, and so little working of the after product that these globules are not broken or flattened, but simply pressed together sufficiently to expel the water and give the butter a solid texture. Then when the butter "sets" it is easily broken off leaving a ragged rupture, and when one succeeds in doing this, which is no great effort, the superiority of granular butter will be accepted by the maker and often followed. Granular butter is simply just butter with 12 per cent of moisture instead of 20 per cent of an admixture of water, salt, cheese, sugar, albumen, etc. The cold water carries out these substances, with the excess of salt, and tells why people like granular butter.

Next to a good cow is a good place to manufacture her produce, and especially is this so in any of the appliances in associated dairying. When the factory is new and clean is a source of pride, but neglect in sanitary precautions soon brings it under the pale of criticism. No reason exists why an "old" factory should not be kept clean and free from stench and rottenness. Cheap tiles and cheap cement make a perfect floor. Drain tiles make a perfect conduit for all kinds of slop and they can be carried far beyond any damaging influence upon milk and cream. The day should be over for building creameries or factories upon stilts, so that the space beneath the floors can become a depository for all kinds of rotten dairy refuse. Hot water and land plaster sprinkled about the presses, etc., after a clean-up, will be a great promoter of sweetness and pure air. A recent number of Hoard's Dairyman says that "the rotten slouchiness of patrons with cans, filthy cheese makers, and rotten rennet skin" should go. And we add that they should go as an object lesson that the owners are becoming wide awake and progressive, and not fall with all their sins into the hands of—the sanitary police. The time is not far distant when the dairy creameries and health boards of the state will, in the interest of pure, clean dairy produce, raid these old and untidy factories, and then they will be legally cleaned up or out. This is "why" this hint is thrown out.

Of a truth all the conditions of the dairying cannot be fully complied with, but the steady purpose to realize them should never be abandoned. The dairy herd can be improved, for such things have been persistently sought by some—and realized. It is not a greater thing to do than the improvement in sheep brought about by the breeders in the past few years. Dairy stock cannot be improved, if a mixing of all breeds is carelessly permitted to go on. It must be realized by the line-breeding, the matter of superior qualities, superior in the dairy line, not all the qualities of the different types of cattle.

The St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway Co. will run a series of cheap holiday excursions from points on their line in Minnesota, Dakota and Manitoba north of, and including, Grand Forks, Crookston, St. Johns, Devils Lake, Grafton, St. Vincent, Winnipeg, etc., etc., for which the very low rate of $40,00 for the round trip will apply to points in Eastern and Western Ontario and Quebec. Tickets will be issued Nov. 5th, 12th, 20th, 27th, and Dec. 3d, 11th, and 17th, limited to 90 days from date of sale and good for stop-over privileges.

A comparison of distances will show that the Manitoba is the shortest line by a great many miles between St. Paul and Minneapolis or Ontario and the principal points in Minnesota, Dakota and Manitoba from which these excursion rates apply.

For these special excursions the Manitoba will run dining cars, Palace Sleepers, free colonist cars and elegant day coaches. This is the only road to Manitoba, Minnesota and Dakota owning and controlling its own dining and sleeping cars, and furnishes a service which is not equalled by any line in the west.

For through tickets at the lowest rates to all parts of the Continent and full particulars regarding these excursions, call upon or write the nearest ticket agent of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Ry., C. H. Mix, agent, Crookston, or to F. I. Whitney, G. P. A., St. Paul. [26-34]

Cheap Excursions to Points East.

The Northern Pacific R. R. announce a series of seven special excursions from Grand Forks, Dak., to points in Eastern Canada and return during November and December.

Tickets will be on sale Nov. 5th, 12th, 20th, 27th, and December 3d, 11th and 17th.

The fare will be at the very low rate of $40 for the round trip; tickets are limited to ninety days from date of sale and good for stop over.

With the completion and opening of the new line through to Winnipeg the Northern Pacific R. R. offers the superior accommodations of dining cars and Pullman sleeping cars through on all trains between St. Paul and Winnipeg. We desire to call special attention to these accommodations as they are an entirely new departure to the traveling public of North Dakota. Bear in mind that no other line offers similar inducements, and, notwithstanding the attractions of fast time, through cars, Pullman sleeping cars and magnificent dining cars, via the Northern Pacific, the fare is always as low as via any other route.

For full information regarding routes, rates, etc., apply to the nearest ticket agent of the Northern Pacific R. R. W. E. Germaine, passenger and ticket agent Grand Forks, H. W. Nunn, agent, Grafton, F. J. Cunningham, agent, Pembina, or Chas. S. Fee, General Passenger and Ticket Agent, St. Paul. [26-34]

Opposed to the Third Party Foolishness.

Rev. Sam Small, the celebrated revivalist, has come to the conclusion that the third party people are misapplying their energy, and in a recent speech in New York, he said:

"When a great battle has been ended the surgeons go forth to search for the quick and the dead. The quick in many instances may be saved, but the dead are past hope. The duty of the third party is to examine that part of the field where it fought and to search for its quick and dead. I am glad it was a kind of sham battle, and we had a chance to eliminate the arrant cowards of the party. We had too many fuss and feathers and aesthetics. This is an age of practical politics and we must let people see that we can do something. We sometimes "pitch into" newspapers because they pay more attention to base ball than revival and religious meetings. But if those follows just went out to the field and gabbled at each other and then marched back to the city the newspapers would soon stop noticing them. They do something. They knock the inside out of a ball; send it over the left field fence and make a man slide sixteen feet to a base. The people are interested in that. But we have been indulging simply in prophetic wind. Those who do it hereafter might as well go and whistle in a graveyard. When Sam Small goes into a fight hereafter, he is going to do something. Some one is going to get hit, and some one is going to get hurt. I don't believe in national prohibition politics. Hereafter I am going to have something practical about my principles, about my vote and about what I do. Principle is worth more to me than all the parties that ever tramped the globe. The liquor dealers don't care for party. They elect the men that will favor their cause, of whatever party they may be. I don't believe in letting the devil's crowd go ahead of me on a proposition of common sense.

We prohibitionists have held the balance of power in fifty-two congressional districts, and we might have used our power to have men put into office favorable to prohibition. But the prohibition party has constantly run independent tickets, instead of joining with some other party, and as a consequence we have no representation. We have also held the balance of power in several of the states, but we have lost our opportunity because we have placed party above principle. When we begin to do something the newspapers will be talking about it, the politicians will be hustling on account of it, and we will be getting some victories. Nationally. I think all the flowery, roseate ideas of having a prohibition president, and our marching up to the White House and drinking his health in pure cold water, will not be realized for a long time."

Jersey Bulletin: Remember that at no season of the year does stock, and especially milch cows, require more care than during the cold, stormy weather liable to come in the autumn. Shelter and extra feeding pays at such a time, for what is lost during the fall is seldom regained throughout the entire winter. Good shelter is economy in that it saves feed, for everyone knows or ought to know that unless an animal is kept warm by artificial means, a large percentage of its food goes to furnish warmth. This subject has been so many times considered that any additional remarks seem superfluous. So no more will be added except a quotation from as good authority as Willard's "Practical Dairy Husbandry:"

The secretions are always disturbed by influences, that cause pain or uneasiness, and every shiver of a half frozen cow will make itself felt in the milk pail. It will often, therefore, be a matter of economy for dairymen to begin feeding the tops of roots, or small quantities of grain, just as soon as the grasses of pasture have been touched with frosts. A daily allowance of bran, shorts or ground feed of barley or oats, or oats and corn, in the proportion of two parts of oats to one of corn, will be of great service in keeping up a flow of milk and at the same time keeping the animal in health and condition.

Duluth Herald: Many people are much worried about Mr. Blaine's chances for a cabinet position. Mr. Blaine is the least troubled of any of them. He is as quiet on the subject as Gen. Harrison himself. Probably the two gentlemen who are most interested in the matter have arrived at an understanding which will be made known to the public in due time. In the mean time Mr. Blaine's friends should remain as calm as possible. If their favorite does not occupy the chair provided by Uncle Sam for the secretary of state he will still be a bigger man than Grover Cleveland and that ought to satisfy anybody.

A Standard for Dairy Cows.

Breeder's Gazette.

At the late Iowa State Fair dairy cows were tested for butter production with the new method devised by F. G. Short, of the Wisconsin Experiment Station. Though it may be questioned whether tests of dairy cows conducted at fairs will ever prove very successful it is quite certain that the effort in this direction will not be relaxed until we know much more upon the subject than at present. Everyone who has anything to do with fast horses admits the absolute necessity of the speed ring and stop watch. The united expression of these two standards lifts certain families and individuals to the summit of popularity and money value, and the absence of such records of performance clearly depresses all others to a corresponding degree. Brag and bluster count for nothing before the stop watch in the hands of the official timer.

In dairy matters, with the exception of a very limited number of tests conducted by the officials of a few of the breeder's associations, we have only the report of interested individuals as to the yields of cows. While believing that many of these reported private tests are correct, just, and honest, on the other hand we are aware that men unconsciously deceive themselves; and that, as the world goes, people cannot be blamed for looking askance at the claims set up by some enthusiastic owners. The lessons of the public speed-ring long ago taught men to put no faith in the claims of any party who would not submit his animals to its test, and the knowledge here gained has created an intense desire for some similar unbiased criterian for judging the merits of individual dairy animals. Tests have been made at the cattle exhibitions at times in the old world, especially England, and on several occasions in America. A couple of years since an exciting contest took place between several breeds at the Minnesota State Fair. In this trial the oil-test churn was used, and while the winners were elated, naturally enough those defeated claimed that the method was not a satisfactory one, and that their cows were not justly dealt with in the result as reported. At the Wisconsin State Fair, about the same time, several cows were milked in the presence of judges, and samples of the milk sent to the Experiment Station of the state for chemical analysis. The report as sent out did not give very general satisfaction, and the feeling seemed to be that the testing should be conducted wholly on the grounds where it could be witnessed by all, and the result announced before the gathering dispursed.

This seems eminently proper, for if a dairy test is to be valued it should be valued it should be conducted in the presence of all interested parties, and by a method so expeditious that people will not forget all about the trial before the result is announced. The method of analysis devised by the chemist of the Wisconsin Station used at the Iowa fair last week possesses the essential qualities here named, if we properly understand it. It is said that the results of the analysis of the evening and morning's milkings can be announced by the noon hour, and that the whole operation of performing the analysis can be conducted in the presence of a large audience without detriment to its accuracy. If this is true we have taken a large stride in the right direction, and our fair managers can announce with confidence that dairymen may bring on their favorites and show them up to the world with full confidence that fairness and justice will preside over the contest.

Barto Favors Graves.

Duluth Tribune: Ex-Governor Barto: "Everybody in our part of the state is for Graves for speaker. I don't know anything about the senatorship. I think everybody is at sea on that subject as much as I am. I just came down on business from St. Cloud, where I have been attending court."

Rations for Holsteins--Rye and Oats.

Farm, Stock and Home

A correspondent asks Prof. Stewart "to construct for him the best and cheapest ration for full blood and grade Holstein-Friesian cows for butter out of the following: Corn ensilage, made from yellow dent corn that would average 60 bushels to the acre. This corn was cut into half-inch lengths and put into the silo when nicely glazed. Winter rye at 90c. per 100 lbs., oats at 75c. per 100 lbs., corn at 48c. per 100 lbs., corn fodder, cut when corn was in dough state, and will be put into the barn before winter, wheat bran at 70c. per 100 lbs., old process linseed meal at $1,24 per 100 lbs.

"Is rye at 90c. per 100 cheaper and better feed for milch cows than oats at 75c. per 100, or corn at 48c. per 100? If the rye is the cheaper, how much?"

To this the Professor replies:

"This correspondent seems to be well situated for feeding Holstein-Friesian cows. His corn ensilage should be of the best quality. Let him grind 100 lbs. of oats with 100 lbs. of corn and then we will use this mixture with bran and old process linseed meal upon ensilage and corn fodder. He should cut his corn fodder very short, the shorter the better—½-inch if he has such a cut.

Let him make up his ration as follows; 40 lbs. corn ensilage, 6 lbs. short cut corn fodder, 8 lbs. ground oats and corn, 6 lbs. wheat bran, 2 lbs. O. P. linseed meal. The following is an analyzed formula of this ration:

	Albuminoids lbs.	Carbhydrates. lbs.	Fat. lbs.
40 lbs. corn ensilage	0.48	4.50	0.21
6 lbs. short-cut corn fodder	0.18	2.40	0.08
8 lbs. ground oats and corn	0.70	4.15	0.34
6 lbs. wheat bran	0.68	2.76	0.15
2 lbs. O. P. linseed meal	0.52	0.51	0.14
Total	2.56	14.64	0.94

"This has nutritive ratio of 1 to 6.6—rather a moderate ration for butter, but no doubt will be successful as an introductory ration in the development of these large milk yielders in the secretion of richer milk. It is not best to give too nitrogenous a ration to cows of this class at first, as it may reduce the quantity. And it is found easier to improve the quality than to increase the quantity of milk, therefore, in selecting cows for improving a herd, choose those of full milk yield, and trust to the best breeding for improvement in qualty.

"This ration is composed of digestible material, and the bran and oil meal will keep up the health and stamina of the cow.

"One hundred pounds of rye contains of digestible element—albuminoids, 8.37 lbs.; carbhydrates, 63.16 lbs.; fat, 1.09 lbs.; while 100 lbs. of oats contain of albuminoids, 8.5 lbs.; carbhydrates, 46.11 lbs.; fat, 4 lbs. In estimating the value from the digestible nutrients, the fat and albuminoids are added together, and the sum multiplied by 4½ cents, and the carbhydrates are multiplied by 0.9c, and the two products, added together, given the estimated value. This makes 100 lbs. of rye worth 98c., and 100 lbs. of oats worth 95c., therefore the oats are the cheaper at their price. It will be seen that oats contain more nitrogen and nearly four times as much fat."

What of Wheat.

Farm Stock and Home.

The present condition of the American wheat market is peculiar. In the first place exports are very light, for the reason that speculation has put our prices above those of our foreign competitors; secondly, the receipts of wheat at all primary markets are small. In fact, the second week of November showed an enormous falling off in receipts from first hands as compared with the first week. These light receipts can scarcely be accounted for by the short crop, for they are proportionately lighter than was the yield, therefore it is fairly safe to conclude that they are occasioned by farmers holding back their wheat, though some contend that they are occasioned by scarcity of wheat in first hands. Notwithstanding the light receipts, the visible supply of wheat is but slightly less than a year ago, while the amount of flour in store is much larger than at this time last year. These facts are beginning to create considerable uneasiness on the part of millers and holders of large blocks of wheat. Already a concerted limiting of flour production is being talked of by millers, with the object of working off the surplus, which has become uncomfortably large. Prices have fallen off not a little during the past two weeks, but how much of the decline is due to legitimate causes and how much to speculation is as yet a matter of conjecture only.

Judging by the light of present conditions it is difficult to see any reasonable grounds for predicting higher prices, still they are freely predicted, and that, too, by seemingly high authority. One of the heaviest millers and wheat operators in Minneapolis asserts that by December first 75 per cent of the Northwestern wheat will have been marketed, and that higher prices are inevitable. But the weight of the assertion is greatly lessened by the fact that its maker is to be the owner of from four to five million bushels of wheat, and is enormously interested in the surplus flour now in store. It is fairly reasonable to conclude that in case the wish is father to the thought,

Again other good authorities, who are not interested save in a general way are strong believers in better prices later in the winter or in the early spring; yet these last base their hopes on European demand sufficiently large to take all of our surplus. If Europe does not take our wheat at present prices, it would seem to indicate that she feels able to supply her wants elsewhere and at lower prices. The recent advance here excited no interest whatever abroad, which scarcely would have been true if there had been any uneasiness on the part of the foreigners regarding their ability to get all the wheat wanted, and at prices less than we seem disposed to take.

As another factor in the price-making problem, it may be well to add that whatever appears to be an unnecessary arbitrary advance in the price of an article of necessity always leads to a marked reduction of its consumption. Speculative prices in bread always excite the antagonism of bread buyers, and they protest against the exaction by substituting other and cheaper food as extensively as possible. The haste with which millers advanced the price of flour and bakers advanced the price of bread—both largely out of proportion to the price of wheat—has probably had no little to do with the present limited demand for flour and decline in the price of wheat.

We would here suggest that it is highly probable that good wheat, good No. 1 hard especially, will be in active demand and holders of it will virtually be masters of its value up to any reasonable point. The demand for seed will be heavy, and the necessity of securing a fair percentage of good wheat, that inferior qualities may be utilized by mixing with it for grinding, will have a tendency to make prime wheat a distinctive commodity, and removed from ordinary market influences.

Of course, Farm, Stock and Home would be delighted to see farmers realize a good round price for their wheat; but, on the other hand, it would deeply regret seeing them misled into holding wheat to their ultimate loss; therefore it gives this brief glance at the present condition of the market leaving its readers to form their own conclusions.

Curing Pork

Farm Stock and Hom.

The following is a favorite English method for curing hams or bacon: Half a pound of saltpetre is pounded fine half used for the two hams, and the other half for the sides. For the bacon the other powdered saltpetre is rubbed into the meat on the flesh sides, and the meat is laid on a bench or table in a cool room, with the skin side down, where it remains 12 hours. Seven pounds of salt and 1½ of brown sugar are then well mixed and heated in a frying pan, and thoroughly rubbed while hot all over the meat. The meat is then put into a tray or cask, and the brine begins to form. The meat is well rubbed or basted with the brine every other day, and turned, the bottom pieces being put on top. After four weeks the meat is hung up to dry and then smoked. The same treatment is given the hams, except that 4 pounds of salt and 1½ pounds sugar are used. These remain in pickle five weeks and are turned every day. The meat is not smoked until it has been thoroughly dried. For dry salting 4 pounds of salt to 1½ pounds of brown sugar. Rub the hams well every day for a week, laying them down on the skin side; afterward every other day for two weeks; then brush off the salt and smoke. For dry salting a table should be so constructed as to carry off the drip into a pail.

From an exchange we clip the following: "For 100 pounds of bacon or ham, take 4 gallons of water, 6 pounds of salt, 2½ ozs. saltpetre, 1½ pounds granulated or A sugar; boil, skim, and when cold pour over meat." Also this: "For 100 pounds of meat take 7 pounds of good salt, 3 pounds of brown sugar (or one quart of molasses) 2 ounces of saltpetre, 2½ ounces of cloves, 2 ounces of black pepper. Boil in sufficint water to cover the meat when closely packed in cask. Skim and cool before using. This pickle is good for hams, shoulders, bacon, corned beef, and dried beef. When corning beef, the blood may be extracted by rubbing well with salt and packing closely in a cask two days, then taken out and washed before putting in pickle." This last formula may be used without the water, rubbing the meat with the other material, after it is well mixed. For domestic use we much prefer the dry process, it makes the sweetest, juicest ham or bacon imaginable; nor is there any difficulty in keeping it through hot weather. If kept in a dry, dark, cool place and so covered that flies cannot get at it there will be no trouble. We have found old salt barrels excellent receptacles for the meat after it was smoked and well dried. For additional security pack in oats, or nice sweet cut hay.

One of the most attractive stores in the city is that of F. E. Hertz & Co., where will be found a full line of albums, plush goods and stationery in endless variety.

Jas. Sheasgreen started for his camp Monday morning. He says he has a gang of sixty men at work, but owing to scarcity of snow, cannot accomplish nearly as much as usual at this season.

Toilet articles and musical instruments, cheap as the cheapest, at F. E. Hertz & Co's.

Mel. Milne, who made such a great hit at the Old Folks Concert, feeling the need of more of that "gracefulness," has joined THE JOURNAL staff again. Mr. Milne is an honest, faithful young man and has a bright future before him. He would make an A. 1. Journalist if he should choose to devote himself to that profession.

If you want anything in the cloak line, call at the New York Store.

A few evenings ago, while enjoying a quiet evening in his pleasant home on the hill, Judge Spendley was called upon to receive two young persons who gave their names as T. F. Larsen and Delila Boyer respectively, and their residence as Grand Forks. Giving them a cordial reception, the Judge in a brief ceremony, gave them their hearts' desire, and they departed as man and wife. The Judge enjoys such events, and always sends his guests away in a happy frame of mind.

The Law and Order League met in the Reading Room last evening. We admire the spirit of manhood exhibited by this organization. We believe in the observance of our laws, imperfect though they may be, and are willing to do all in our power to help effect not only this, but the framing of a more perfect system of laws regarding the liquor traffic.

Elegant line of underwear at the C. O. D. Clothing House.

Our reporter having occasion to step into the store of F. E. Hertz & Co. was greeted with a charming sight. The stock was arranged with the most exquisite taste, and everything gave evidence of a choice selection of goods arranged and cared for by experienced hands. Such a store is a credit to the city, and the enterprise that makes it such, should be rewarded by a liberal patronage.

Where is Herb? At the front, "with both feet" as usual, holding aloft an immense Christmas tree, and surrounded by such a display of rocking-horses, sleds and other toys as will make many a boyish heart flutter with expectancy. Herb does n't let anyone leave him in enterprise, and he's at the old stand ready to receive all who want bargains in holiday goods.

Herb can furnish a doll for every little girl in Crookston. Call and see his stock.

Prof. Moore is desirous of organizing a class in the advanced studies, after January 1st, and suggests that some of the county teachers, not engaged during the winter, take advantage of the opportunity for improvement. Enterprise calls for this on the part of our teachers, and it will be the enterprising teachers who gain the positions of honor and profit hereafter in Polk County. Some of our teachers have the erroneous impression that unless they can attend some distant academy or normal school, there is no chance for advancement, when the true facts in the case are that with an earnest desire for improvement and the help offered by our high school instructors, who are "way up" in the profession, they could ascend to a higher plane than they now tread. One thing is certain: he who does not make the best of that which is at hand, would make but a partial success of life, if given the best the world affords.

C. E. Ford will spend the holidays with his family in Minneapolis.

C. M. Ohl who has been in business here for the past four years left on Monday for Chicago where he will make his future home. With his departure our town loses a good citizen, a man of the highest business principles and the county a staunch temperance republican. We only echo the sentiment of this neighborhood while we wish him health, wealth and happiness in his new location.

Within the past month spelling matches have been held in districts 91, 53 and 104. The teacher of district 91 appointed one for last Friday evening. The members of the district together with their friends from the adjoining districts numbering about 30 were very much disappointed to learn after they had reached the school house that the teacher had skipped. Remarks were made by the treasurer of the district that were not complimentary to the teacher and our advice given in a kindly spirit would be for her to explain her sudden departure.

Magnificent Mail Service!

A letter writted at Stephen and sent to THE JOURNAL on Dec. 11th reached our post office on Dec. 13th! Two days to come a distance that even our present cattle train requires only about four hours to accomplish! It strikes us that such little trifles as these are wholly unpardenable and demand investigation. It would seem that a little service that should only requre four or five hours ought in reason to be accomplished in less than 48 hours. Last summer we would have received that letter on the same day it was written and an answer could have been sent the next. But under the present arrangment our business interests have to suffer greatly while that cost is no less.

AN ORDINANCE.

An ordinance granting the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoby Railway Company the right to excavate, construct and maintain a ditch along the west side of Main Street, in the townsite of Carman, in the city of Crookston.

THE CITY COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF CROOKSTON DO ORDAIN.

SECTION 1. The St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway Company, its successors and assigns, are hereby granted the right the excavate, construct and maintain a ditch or drain of sufficient capacity to carry off the water draining into the same upon the west twenty (20) feet, of Main Street, in the townsite of Carman, in said city of Crookston, from the southerly end of said Main Street to a point seventy (70) feet north of the southeast corner of block "I", in said townsite, thence northeasterly, across said Main Street to the west line of block forty-nine (49,) thence across Crescent Avenue and Water Street, in said townsite, a map of which ditch or drain is on file in the office of the city clerk, of said city of Crookston, showing the course and location thereof. Said ditch or drain is to be covered, from a point, in said Main Street, one hundred and twenty (120) feet northerly from the southeast corner of block "G," northward to the intersection of the said ditch or drain with the Red Lake River, as shown on said map.

SECTION 2. The right to excavate, construct and maintain said ditch or drain, as aforesaid, is granted upon the express condition that the said railway company, its successors and assigns, shall maintain suitable bridges and cross walks across said ditch or drain where the same is open, and crosses any public street or avenue intersecting said Main Street. Said bridges to be constructed and maintained in accordance with plans and specifications to be furnished by the city engineer, and that they will construct a suitable fence along the east line of the same.

SECTION 3. This ordinance shall take effect from and after its passage and publication.

Approved Dec. 13th 1888.
[SEAL.] WM. WATTS,
Acting Mayor.
Attest:
John Paterson, City Clerk.

Take Notice.

Now is the time to call at Johnson's little gallery on Main Street. opposite the Canada House, for your picture. I will do work for a few days at the following rates: Eight tin types 75 cents; four card photographs 99 cents; twelve cabinets $2. My First Grizzly.

BY M. C. BROWN.

I was always fond of a gun. Born and brought up in the backwoods of Maine, I can scarcely remember the time when I could not handle a rifle. It was my constant companion, when a boy, home at my father's farm; and, indeed, my father used to declare that all the work I did would not pay for the ammunition I wasted. However, he never interfered with my favorite sport to any great degree, for I, being an only son, had everything pretty much my own way. I roamed the woods at will, shooting whatever of game I chanced to find, until, from long practice, I grew to be very expert with the rifle, and, while yet a mere youth, I came to be known as the best shot in the neighborhood. This distinction naturally made me a little proud, and I came to think myself vastly superior to the rest of the young men of my age, who contented themselves with staying at home and helping their fathers on the farm. I began to grow tired of the small game which I found in the woods around home. I read glowing accounts of the adventures of hunters in the far West, as they met in fierce encounter the wily panther, the fierce grizzly, or the terrible lion of California. I longed to visit these wilds, to meet and slay the dread denizens of the forest; in fact, to be another Kit Carson or Buffalo Bill. So, when I reached my twenty-first birthday, I informed my parents that I should at once start for the far West. They were not much surprised, knowing well the bent of my inclinations, and but little objection was raised. I had an uncle, an older brother of my father, who lived on a ranch in the southwestern part of California, and to him it was decided that I should go. Accordingly, my things were packed, including, of course, my rifle, and all the accoutrements of a disciple of Nimrod, and my father drove me down to the station.

"Well, my boy," said he, as he stood with me on the platform of the depot, "have a good time, and see all of the world you can—a little knocking around won't hurt you any—and when you get enough of the 'Wild West,' and have killed all the grizzlies and lions in California, remember that you've got a home away back in Maine, and that the old folks will always be glad to see you." I assured him that I would, and, springing on board, the cars were whirled away toward the mighty West. I had no adventure worth recording on my journey, and in due time found myself at my destination. I was warmly received by my uncle and aunt, who had received a letter telling them of my intended visit. Being without children, they were glad to have some one for company. They soon became aware of my ambition to exterminate the wild beasts of the vicinity, and in reply to my inquiries concerning grizzlies, my uncle said, with, as I imagined, an amused expression, that there were a few left, but that few people cared to go out of their way to encounter one! I made haste to inform him that I was not at all unwilling to meet one at any time; that I had come hundreds of miles out of my way for the purpose of encountering one, and that I sincerely hoped I should be fortunate enough to run across one before long.

"Well," replied Uncle Joe (his name was Joseph Lawrence), "maybe you're good for one; but a man ought to be a number-one shot, and pretty handy with a hunting-knife, too, before he tackles one of the varmints."

"I was counted the best shot in the county back home," said I. "I've often put a bullet into the eye of a squirrel on the top limb of a tree, over thirty yards away."

"That's pretty fine shooting, to be sure," returned Uncle Joe; "but don't you think it might make a little difference with your aim, whether you were shooting at a squirrel thirty yards away, or squinting over your gun at a tearing, snarling monster that would be pretty sure to make hash of you if you happened to miss him?"

I had not thought of this before, but would not admit the possibility of my losing my head at sight of a bear, and I expressed a hope that I should be able to show him before long.

My uncle made no reply; but I could see that he considered me a little "fresh," as the saying is, and I resolved to convince him of his error at the first opportunity.

The next day, as we were seated at dinner, I said, "Speaking of hunting, Uncle Joe, have you got any crack shots around here? any famous hunters, such as we read of?"

"Why, yes," he replied reflectively, "we've got some pretty fair marksmen; one, in particular, who, I think, will hold you pretty close in the matter of shooting."

"Where does he live?" I asked with interest. "I should like to make his acquaintance."

"It isn't a 'he,'" rejoined my uncle, with a laugh; "it's a she! It is Dell Ford, the only daughter of old Jack Ford, who owns the big ranch down on the river."

"A girl!" said I disdainfully; for, as is often the case with young men of my age, I had a profound contempt for the fair sex in general, and thought them fit only to raise flowers or make embroidery. "A pretty hunter she must be! I should think the proper place for a girl would be in the house, and not tearing about in the woods."

"Dell is as nice a girl as ever breathed," put in my aunt, with whom the young lady was evidently a prime favorite. "Her mother is dead, and her father is away on the range, looking after his stock a great deal, and so has taught her to shoot, so that she may be able to protect herself. When she rambles in the woods, she of course, generally takes her gun with her, and so has become to be quite a hunter."

"Well," said I, stubbornly, "it may be all right for a lady to go scrambling through brush and over logs hunting wildcats and bears; but I don't think so. In my opinion, it's both unrefined and unladylike."

My aunt was about to reply, when a warning look from Uncle Joe made her pause, and, following the direction of his gaze, we all looked out of the window which faced the road. A sleek, black pony was quietly nibbling the grass that grew by the roadside, and coming up the walk, within a few yards of the trees, was a young girl whom I felt instinctively to be the subject of our conversation. She was not over eighteen, rather small and slender in figure, yet the well-rounded outlines of both form and face denoted perfect health and vigor. Her every motion was replete with the free ease and grace of a true daughter of nature. Her hair, which was glossy black, clung in close ringlets about the well-shaped head. Her soft, round cheek wore a slight rose flush, indicative of plenty of exercise in the open air, and her jet-black eyes, naturally soft and melting, had in them a gleam that made me certain she had overheard my last remarks. She was dressed in neat, close-fitting garments, and the dainty boots that were just visible beneath her skirts were exceedingly small and well-shaped. My aunt hastened to the door to welcome her, and they soon entered the room.

"Dell, my dear, this is my nephew, Mr. Lawrence, who has just come from the east to visit us. Thomas, Miss Ford, our nearest neighbor."

I rose to acknowledge the introduction, feeling awkward and embarrassed enough. Miss Ford greeted me in a cool, distant manner that left no doubt that she had both heard and resented my disparaging remarks. I would have given anything to recall them, for I saw at a glance that they were entirely unjust. She was not unrefined or unladylike. She conducted herself with a quiet dignity which won my admiration and respect. I was heartily ashamed of my rude criticism, and resolved never again to pass judgment on a person whom I had not seen. She did not stay long, having come on some trivial errand; but in that time I saw that she was superior, both in physical and mental graces, to any young lady I had ever met. And what was her opinion of me? I did not like to think. She soon arose to go, my aunt walking with her to the gate. I sat stupidly gazing after her until she was preparing to mount, then suddenly recollecting my manners, I seized my hat, and hurried down the walk to proffer my assistance. She stood by her pony, one hand resting on his glossy mane, talking to my aunt. Just as I was about to offer my services, she turned quickly, and with a light bound sprang into the saddle and shook the reins out over the pony's arching neck. The instant he felt her light weight, he bounded forward at a quick gallop, and, with a cool nod to me and a wave of her hand to my aunt, the young lady was gone. As I stood looking after her in a bewildered sort of way, I felt a sudden slap on my shoulder, and my uncle's voice said,—

"Well, Thomas, my boy, what do you think of the wild girl of the woods, now? Regular tom-boy, ain't she?"

"Uncle," said I, "I've made an abominable fool of myself, and I know it just as well as you do."

"Well, that's hopeful," returned he, encouragingly. "If a man knows where he makes a fool of himself, he won't be apt to do it again in the same way."

"But I'm afraid she will never forgive me for what I said," said I ruefully.

"She's got plenty of spirit," replied Uncle Joe, "and naturally resented the idea of being called unlady like. You've made a bad beginning, that's a fact. It wasn't a good plan," he added slowly, "to express an opinion on the character of the person you don't know anything about."

This was all true enough, but it was not very consoling to me in my present state of mind, and, without making any reply, I entered the house, took down my rifle, and set out for the woods. My thoughts were none of the pleasantest as I wandered aimlessly under the trees, paying little attention to what was going on around me. Do what I would, the image of Dell Ford, seated jauntily on her black pony, was ever before my eyes when I essayed to look for game.

I found no grizzlies that day, or on any of my subsequent expeditions during the next two or three weeks. Several times I met Miss Ford, sometimes on foot, but more often on her pony, but, as she never condescended to give me any greeting than a cool nod of her head, our acquaintance did not progress very rapidly. One warm, hazy afternoon, about a month after our first meeting at the house I shouldered my gun and sauntered out into the woods, more for the chance of being alone with my thoughts than anything else. I pushed moodily along, scattering the dry leaves from the path as I went, and idly watching them as the playful wind bore them whirling away.

Everything about me suggested joy, and peace, and beauty,—the grand trees, their tops waving against the azure sky many feet above me; feathered songsters of almost every hue sporting among the leafy boughs, pouring forth in strains of rapturous music, their hymns of praise to their Maker, and over all the yellow gold of the afternoon sunlight streaming softly through the lattice-work of leaves. But my mind was in no frame to respond to the beauties of nature. "What is the use," I mused, "fooling away any more time here? I'm sure there's nothing particularly interesting about this place. As for grizzlies, I haven't seen a sign of one yet, and I don't believe—hello! what's that?" I was brought to a sudden halt in my meditations by a crash of the underbrush just ahead of me. Stopping, with my eyes fixed on the spot from whence the sounds came, and my gun in position for instant use, I waited for a sight of the approaching game. Suddenly, through an opening in the brush, I caught a glimpse of a shaggy, gray object, that sent a thrill through every part of my body. A grizzly at last! Now I would show Uncle Joe and the rest of them that I was no tenderfoot. Leveling my rifle at the bushes a little ahead of where I had seen the monster, I pulled the trigger Crack! went my faithful rifle, and, as the smoke cleared away, I heard a noise as of something kicking and struggling in the bushes. Dropping my gun, I drew my hunting-knife, and sprang forward to dispatch the monster. My heart thumped fiercely against my ribs, as I poked the bushes aside, and peered in; and, as I gazed, I felt a cold chill stealing down my spinal column. My knife dropped from my nerveless grasp, and, with feeling more easily imagined than described, I stared at the object before me. There, on the ground, gently kicking its last, lay—not a grizzly bear, but oh, heavens, a calf! I sat down on the ground, and buried my face in my hands. The sudden revulsion of feeling left me, as Uncle Joe would have said, as "limp as a dish-rag."

The case was certainly ludicrous enough, but I could not see the funny side of it then. My heart was filled with disappointment and chagrin. Here I had come hundreds of miles, and tramped through the woods for a month, all for the sake of shooting a calf. And the disgrace, the ridicule and scorn that I should have to face if the affair got out! What would Uncle Joe say? and Miss Ford! I felt that I would rather die than have her know what a fool I had made of myself. And then it occurred to me that I had better be getting away from the place before some one came along, and discovered the effects of my wonderful shot. I rose from my recumbent position on the ground, and was about to hurry from the scene of my "thrilling adventure," when a soft, musical laugh rang through the forest, and looking round, I saw Dell Ford sitting demurely on her pony, and looking, with evident amusement, first at me and then at my "grizzly."

"How do you do, Mr. Lawrence?" said she wickedly, as she caught my eye. "When are you going to open your meat market? And, pray, how much shall you charge for nice, fresh veal?"

"Without waiting to hear more, I turned and plunged into the forest, not knowing or caring where I went. Oh, how I wished I had never seen the place! What a fool I was for coming there! Everything seemed against me, and I resolved to catch the early morning train for the east, and so shake the dust of California forever from my unlucky feet.

Thus cogitating, I strode rapidly onward until suddenly, on looking up I found myself on the bank of the river. Seating myself on a fallen tree that projected over the water, I scooped up a handful of the cool, sparkling liquid, and bathed my hot face and throbbing temples. After sitting there for some time, during which I became considerably cooled off, mentally as well as physically, I began to see that I had again acted very foolishly. Why had I not stayed and faced the thing out? I had done nothing wrong, at least, not intentionally, and I resolved that, instead of running away, I would stay, and brave it out, find out, if possible, the owner of the calf, and pay him for it, and thus show people that, although I might be a tenderfoot, I was no sneak.

Having decided upon my course of action, I determined to return to the carcass, and see if there was not some mark or brand upon it, which would give me a clue to its owner. But the thought that I might meet Dell Ford, and again be exposed to her ridicule, made me hesitate. Somehow, I dreaded having her laugh at me more than anything in the world, "till she has had time to get away."

As I sat gazing listlessly into the water, a large fish, attracted probably, by the swarm of insects hovering over the surface, shot suddenly out of the water at my feet. The sight of this specimen of the finney tribe put a new idea into my head. "Uncle Joe said there was good fishing in the river," I exclaimed. "I've a mind to try my luck; I won't be apt to get hold of any one's calf with my hook; that's one consolation." I had a line in my pocket, and, with my knife, soon cut a suitable pole from a willow bush that grew near the bank. Leaning my rifle against a tree, I walked out on the fallen tree, as far as it would sustain my weight, and casting my line into the water, waited with Job-like patience for a bite; nor had I long to wait, for I soon found that Uncle Joe had told nothing but the truth, although it might be a "fish story." The fishing was excellent. In less than half an hour I had a fine string of lusty fellows, which I concluded would be sufficient for a mess. Hauling in my line, I rose, started back toward the shore, when a sight met my eyes which nearly caused me to loose my balance and fall into the river.

There on the other end of the log sat a great shaggy monster, that I knew in an instant must be a grizzly. His rough, grizzly, gray fur, fierce eyes and huge claws, which, to my excited gaze, seemed to be fully six inches in length, all convinced me that this was the animal whose acquaintance I had been so anxious to make. Under ordinary circumstances I felt that I should have been happy to meet him, but now, balancing myself with difficulty on my narrow footing, with the river gushing and swirling beneath me, and my rifle leaning against a tree full fifty feet away, I can assure you that the meeting was anything but pleasant, at least for me. To get my gun was impossible, with that savage brute sitting on the log between me and the bank, evidently congratulating himself, on the neat way in which he had entrapped me. As I stood staring at him, he slowly unloosed one of his great claws from its hold on the bark, and putting it carefully forward, began crawling cautiously along the log. He was coming out after me.

Instinctively I retreated as far toward the top of the tree as possible, at the same time looking around for some means of escape. I looked across to the opposite bank; being an expert swimmer, might I not hope by jumping into the river, to out-swim bruin, and gain the opposite shore in time to escape him? I scanned the banks anxiously, but all along, as far as the eye could reach, they were high and bluffy, and escape that way seemed impossible; while if I tried to make the bank from whence I came, the bear, being nearer land than I, would certainly be there first to give me a warm reception. Meanwhile, the growling monster was steadily coming nearer, the tree bending and creaking beneath his weight, till I feared, or hoped,—I scarcely knew which,—that it would break, and let us both down into the river.

Now he was so near that, by putting out my hand, I might almost have touched him. I stood, with one hand grasping a limb support, and the other clutching the string of fish, which, strangely enough, I had not dropped, utterly incapable of motion. When within less than three feet of me, the bear suddenly rose on his hind feet, and stretched out his great claws to grab me. Wildly, scarce knowing what I did, I struck at the brute with the fish which I held in my hand. As they struck his nose, bruin sniffed eagerly at them, and, clutching them in his paws, began greedily to devour them.

Here was a moment's respite. I had heard that polar bears were very fond of fish, but did not know before that his grizzly relative had the same weakness. As he sat erect on his haunches, busily engaged with his meal, a new idea suddenly struck me. We were both so near the end of the fallen tree that it bent and swayed beneath us. If I could, by giving the tree a shake, tumble my unwelcome visitor into the water, I might reach the bank in time to get my rifle, and dispatch him before he could swim to the shore. Placing my feet firmly on the trunk of the tree, and grasping the limb above me with both hands, I gave a sudden spring. Horror! the dead tree snapped short off, and precipitated us both into the river. I clutched at the broken tree-top as we struck the water, but the swift current wrenched it away from me, and bore it rapidly down stream. Nothing now remained but a race for life, and turning my head toward the shore, I struck out lustily.

The bear was also doing his best, and soon began to leave me behind. I strained every nerve, but it was no use. Before I had made half the distance, the creature touched bottom, and crawled out upon the bank. Shaking the water from his shaggy coat, he turned, and with a low growl of triumph, awaited my coming. As I took in the situation, a sudden despair seized me, and hope seemed to die in my heart. I closed my eyes, and was about to let myself drift with the current, when "Dive!" rang out in clear tones that echoed through the forest. Mechanically I dropped my head beneath the surface, and the next instant the sharp crack of a rifle rang out over the water. Lifting my head once more above the water, I looked toward the shore; there lay the bear, kicking, and clawing up the sand and leaves in a terrible manner; and there a few yards away, the smoking rifle grasped firmly in her slender, brown fingers, stood my rescuer, Dell Ford. Coolly she watched the struggling monster, and as he still displayed considerable activity, she stepped forward, and picking up my rifle, she prepared to give him a finishing shot. But it was not needed. With a final struggle the bear rolled over on his back, stretched out his terrible claws to their full length, and with a spasmodic clutch at the empty air, yielded up the ghost. So taken up was I with the death struggles of the grizzly, and so lost in the admiration of the brave girl who had saved my life, that I am not sure I should have sense enough left to swim ashore, had not the merry voice of my deliverer broken the spell that was upon me.

"Come, Mr. Lawrence," she cried, "isn't it about time you came out of the water? You'll catch cold if you stay out much longer." Aroused by her merry badinage I struck out for terra firma, and was soon crawling sheepishly up the bank. As I stood before my preserver, the water dripping from my clothes at every available point, my appearance must have been ludicrous enough. The young girl made a desperate attempt to look solemn, which ended by her bursting into an uncontrollable fit of laughing, in which I was soon forced to join. As soon as gravity was regained, I said earnestly, "Miss Ford, how can I ever repay you for what you have done?" "It is nothing more than anyone would have done under the same circumstances," she replied. "Pray, don't mention it." "But everyone could not have done it," I persisted, "I don't believe there's another girl in the country that would have the nerve to do what you have done. You may well be proud of your shot, Miss Ford."

"But it is so unladylike and unrefined," she answered mischievously.

"Miss Ford," said I humbly, "those foolish words of mine have caused me more regret than anything I ever uttered. The moment I saw you I saw how entirely unjust they were, and I have longed for an opportunity to ask your pardon. Can you forgive me?"

For a moment the soft black eyes were lifted to my face, and then she frankly extended her hand. "Certainly I will forgive you," she replied. "Please don't think anything more about it. But come," she added, looking at my dripping garments, "you will surely catch cold if we stand here talking much longer. Our house is only a little way off, father is at home now, and will be glad to welcome you."

I accepted the invitation, as the sun was setting, and it would have been dark ere I could have reached my uncle's. I found Mr. Ford a pleasant host, and spent a most delightful evening. So prepossessed was I in their favor that I fell into a habit of visiting the Ford's quite often (to see the old gentleman, of course), until finally—well, Miss Dell, thinking, I suppose, that it was not right to leave me wandering about in the woods without some one to look after me, consented to become my natural protector, and we have settled down for life near the scene of "My First Encounter with a Grizzly."—Yankee Blade.

A SLIP.

He was dapper and dandy,
And sweeter than candy,
His shoes nicely shined and a smile on his face;
But the sweet look of pleasure
On the face of the treasure
Disappeared when he came to a real muddy place.

A little round stone
He had picked up and thrown
About half way across where he thought he could step;
When he took careful aim,
And jumped to the same,
For a moment it seemed that success crowned his leap.

But "There's many a slip
Twixt the cup and the lip,"
And his foot struck that stone with an ominous thud;
The stone rolled around
And his sweetness sat down
On the floor of his pants in six inches of mud.

A Successful Burglar.

HE TELLS IT.

Mother and the girls were quite in ecstasties over the new house. The masculine members of the family were inclined to be dubious as to its advantages. The chief objection which we had to it was that it was of a row of eight, all exactly alike, and it was extremely difficult to be sure of the right door.

A week's practice, however, made that all right; ours was the fourth house from the south end of the row; as I walked from the office along the street immediately south of us, I soon became accustomed to taking the exact number of steps, after turning the corner, which would bring me to the door.

Besides, the hour at which I came home (I am a proofreader on a morning paper and my duties usually kept me at the office until after 3 a. m.) made it necessary for me to carry a latchkey. While I knew that of course our neighbors had exactly the same conveniences which we enjoyed, and looked for light to windows in in the same portion of exactly similar rooms, and experienced the annoyance of smoky chimneys when the wind was in the particular quarter which affected ours, I did not dream that the houses were so precisely the same that the key of one would unlock the other.

We had lived here about a week when the street car line near by began running owl cars. This was a boon for me, as it saved me a walk of some length. The car line ran within half a square of the house, being on the next street north of us.

The first night that I rode home I was so sleepy when I got out of the car that I scarcely knew what I was doing. Hitherto the exercise of walking had kept me wide awake until I got to my own room. I managed to unlock the front door, however, and get upstairs, habit making my movements noiseless, as I knew that my mother was easily awakened and did not readily go to sleep again.

The room which I occupied was over the dining room, the door being nearly opposite to the head of the stairs. Somewhat to my surprise the gas was not burning on the landing; the girls had probably forgotten to light it before going to bed. I groped my way carefully along, and at last reached the door of my room. I entered; it was like the hall, pitch dark. I tried to find the table, on which there should be a lamp, and my hand came in contact with something else. I drew a match from my pocket and struck it. As I held it screened by my hand I saw that the room was a strange one. Suddenly, all was dark; it was not that the match had gone out, but the brain was shadowed; I knew nothing more.

SHE TELLS IT.

I was always rated courageous, I seemed to lack that instinctive fear which causes some to shrink from darkness and loneliness. My brothers and sisters often declared that I would never be frightened; not even, added May, with a shudder, if a burglar were to present himself before me and demand my valuables. These would not tempt any well regulated burglar, being small and of little intrinsic value; but I should not like to lose them, and I have always determined to defend my property stoutly if threatened, providing, of course, that I had sufficient warning of the robber's intentions to enable me to act.

I awoke one morning at that proverbial darkest hour, just before the dawn. I had no idea what time it was, as the whole house was wrapped in silence and darkness; it is from after events that I am able to say that it was nearly morning. I had started suddenly from sleep, but at first I could not tell what had aroused me. As I lay listening for some sound to follow the land of dreams, my thoughts turned instinctively to our next door neighbors, who had been domiciled in the row for about a week.

Nobody knew them, although several of the old residents had spoken of calling upon them—perhaps; for we liked the looks of the ladies and they seemed inclined to be friendly. The men, however, seemed to be home all day and away all night. They were not working men—one could see that by their hands, their clothing, their bearing—and we were afraid they were not just what they should be. We recalled certain grewsome stories of counterfeiters, burglars and other criminals who settle in respectable neighborhoods and only excited suspicion by the unreasonable hours which they kept.

Was that a step up the stairs? I listened more intently, my wandering thoughts recalled from all other subjects. Surely it was, and that was another. There was a burglar in the house. I sprang out of bed and enveloped myself in a circular which chanced to be hanging on a chair, as I had worn it out into the rain the preceding evening. If I was to receive a burglar I was determined that the proprietors should not suffer; I would have something on besides my night dress; while if he went to any other room I could steal along the dark halls to alarm my brothers and be less noticeable in this dark wrap than in my night gown.

In spite of my boasted courage, my heart beat very loudly as the step was heard once more, and this time upon the landing just outside my own door. I grasped the poker firmly, however, trying to restore my wonted courage by the pressure of that formidably weapon in my hand. It was a plain, heavy bar of iron, at which the others often laughed, declaring that it must make me tired to rake the fire.

The knob of the door turned slowly and cautiously; and the burglars enters the room. What would he do next? He closed the door as gently as he had opened it, and for a moment seemed undecided. Did he have a dark lantern and a pistol? I could not imagine a burglar without such adjuncts, both of which were unfamiliar objects to me; and I shivered as I thought of the advantage which he would have over me and my poker.

Evidently the dark lantern was not in working order, however, for he simply struck a match. The little flame showed me that our new neighbors were not unfounded upon reason—this was one of them. They were certainly a gang of burglars.

He made a step toward the dresses. To reach it he must pass me. He was within reach of my arm. I raised my weapon, and, uttering the loudest scream of which my lungs were capable, I struck him on the side of the head. He fell like a log to the floor. Horrors! I had killed him!

My renewed screams alarmed the house and the others were speedily by my side. I had already lighted the gas and was on my knees beside the man that I had struck, vainly endeavoring to recall life. My assortment of restoratives, I was afterward assured, was sufficient to have revived a dozen swooning men.

"What in the world"—began my brother as he appeared on the scene. He was the first to come to the room.

"Oh, my burglar's come!" I exclaimed, half hysterically, "but I've killed him."

"Wholly unnecessary severity," remarked Tom; "you always overdo the thing. But that man isn't dead."

As if to confirm his words, the burglar just then opened his eyes and looked inquiringly around him.

"He looks dazed," I whispered to Tom.

"He has occasion to look dazed if you hit him with your beloved poker," rejoined Tom, pushing me aside and applying restoratives in his turn; "put it where it belongs, and go get me some brandy or whisky, or something of the kind. We'll have to get this fellow on his feet before we call the police."

"I—I was mistaken, sir," said the burglar in a feeble voice, but with a very decided manner. "I was mistaken in the house. It appears that the same latchkey unlocks both doors, and I got the wrong one."

"Yes, I think you did," rejoined Tom emphatically, and eyeing him with suspicion.

The burglar managed to scramble to his feet, although I could see he was still dizzy from the encounter with my poker. I retired into the closet and held the door shut—that is very nearly.

"I think that you will do me the favor to change your mind about sending for the police," he said, "when I explain I am employed upon a morning paper and am not through with my work until nearly this hour in the morning. I usually walk home. But I took advantage of the new owl cars to-night and went to sleep on my way home, hardly waking up when I got out and walked the half block here. I live at 415, and I hope that you will accept my explanation and apologies and allow me to go home to bed. I am very sorry I have disturbed the lady and probably frightened her."

"It seems to me," said Tom, putting out his hand, "that the lady is perfectly well able to take care of herself, and that you ought to know it."

The stranger laughed good naturedly,

"She tried to beat it into my head, at any rate. But you will convey my apologies to her?"

The two men went down stairs then, and I heard no more. But the blow on our neighbor's head effectually broke the ice between the two families and we became firm friends.

I was married about two years after the episode of the burglar. My husband declares that he is not afraid of the house being entered while he is away, for my fame must have gone abroad; while if, under the supposition that my vigilance relaxed when he chanced to be at home, they should come while he is there, he would be sure of being ably defended,

A Palace of Salt.

The people of Salt Lake City are contemplating the erection of a great "salt palace." It would be a structure that would lay in the shade all the ice and corn palaces ever constructed. The maine part of the structure could be of the finest specimens of rock salt to be found in the quarries, chiselled, carved and artistically arranged; while the interior fittings should be of crystallized work from the lake on a grand scale.

Such a palace should be permanent if properly protected from the Winter rains; it could be made of the most unique and striking style of architecture; it could be made one of the wonders of the world. When lighted by electricity the structure would have all the sparkle and diamond glitter of the great ice palaces, and with the difference in the salt palace's favor that heat would not melt or dim its glories in the least.

My Poor Back!

That "poor back" is held responsible for more than its share of the sufferings of mankind. If your dog bites a man who kicks it, do you blame the dog? On the same principle the kidneys utter their protest against nervousness, impure blood, and resulting constipation. These force them to do extraordinary work in ridding the system of the poisons which are the result of effete matter retained in the blood. Then the sufferer says the back aches; the kidneys are diseased. "Not yet;" but they will be unless the nerves are strengthened, the blood purified, and the constipation removed. These are the causes of kidney troubles, and Paine's Celery Compound removes them quickly. With its tonic, purifying, and laxative effect, it also strengthens the weak kidneys, making it almost infallible in curing all diseases of the nerves and kidneys. If your hopes of cure have not been realized, try Paine's Celery Compound; it gives perfect health to all who complain of "their poor backs." Price $1.00.

In fact it is a movement gotten up with a view to the most accurate time keeping qualities possible, and is so strongly and accurately made, fitted and adjusted that with fair usage it would last a lifetime. The above described watch has been sold for $25, but we are now selling them for $5.87.
"How can you sell this watch so cheap?" Our answer:—We contract with the manufacturers for them in hundred gross lots, thereby obtaining them at the lowest possible figure. We give you the benefit of this figure when we sell you the watch at $5.87.
"Why do you do this?" Because we wish to obtain the names and addresses of parties who are likely to buy watches, so that we may send one of our mammoth catalogues of Ladies' and Gents' Gold and Gold Filled Watches, which always results in further sales, as our goods are the best and cheapest in the world.
"How are we to know your watches to be as represented?" We answer:—In order to satisfy the most skeptical we send it for examination before purchasing. We ask no one to pay for it until they are satisfied that it is just as represented. In case you wish to examine the watch before purchasing, it will be necessary for you to send 50 cents in postage stamps to show that you mean business, and we will then send it to you C.O.D. If after examination you find it to be as represented you can pay the balance $5.37, otherwise nothing. Send your order at once; this offer is good for 23 days only, and the adv. will never appear again. We refer to any reliable business house in Chicago, or the Ft. Dearborn Nat. Bk.

GETTING READY FOR HUNTING.

What the Sportsmen are Buying for the Fall's Shooting—An Outfit Worth $5,000.

It was a long, limp, narrow bag with strings around the opening, and it was hung up conspicuously in the store of a dealer in sportsmen's goods.

"If you want an item," said the proprietor, pointing to it, "you might get one on the subject of sleeping bags. That is a sleeping bag. The present cold and damp weather has caused the hunters to look more to their comfort than usual, and the result is that there is a drive in sleeping bags. What do they cost? All the way from $25 to $250. The latter are lined with the most expensive fur; they are made, as you see, in the shape of a large bag, big enough for a man to get into and be entirely covered up. They are shirred around one end, or the neck, and are sometimes made so long that you can draw the opening together above your head; this is when you are hunting when the weather is snowy or very cold. Sometimes they are lined with sealskin, but as a rule with less costly furs, and occasionally, when they are wanted for a short trip, the lining is made of blankets. We are now making one of the latter for Mr. John G. Heckscher, who is about starting on a hunting trip. Those lined with blankets cost from $25 to $30: the outside of the bags, as a rule, are waterproof canvas, though there are some that are covered with rubber. They can be folded in small compass and you can sleep in them most anywhere."

"What do hunters' suits cost?"

"They can be had from $3 to $60. Canvas suits are sold from $3 to $10; cordoroy from $25 to $30 and velveteen from $50 to $60.

"Is there anything new in hunting guns?"

"Yes, the ejector gun, that throws out the empty cartridge. This is coming into use, and is the latest. It is called the highest development of the sporting shotgun, and costs from $250 to $350. Talking about shotguns, there are sport-loving men of this city who have an outfit of from six to twelve guns. I know of men who have a dozen fine guns, from a thirty-six bore breechloader, such as a lady may use, to a four-bore hammerless, which is used for point shooting. This fall the thirty-six bore is quite popular, especially for upland shooting, because it is light. It weighs only four or five pounds."

"What are some of the highest prices paid for shotguns?"

"From $450 to $500 with one set of barrels, and with a double set of barrels half as much more. These are finely made and are of the very best materials. The barrel is of the best Damascus steel and the stock of Italian walnut elaborately engraved."

"What does an average outfit for a hunter cost?"

"The actual outfit would consist of a suit, about $25, cartridge belt $1.25 and gun $125, or a total of $151,25. The cheapest outfit would be about $30, which would include a gun for $25, a suit for $3 and a cartridge belt for $1.25. But there are wealthy sportsmen in this city who have as much as $5,000 invested in hunting appliances, and some even more than that. They collect their guns gradually, adding one or two to their stock as they feel the need or as improvements are made. There are many persons who have a fancy for collecting old guns and antique arms, and who have a room in their houses fitted up with hunting appliances and articles that suggest hunting and the sports. The other day we fitted up a billiard-room in this manner for a wealthy gentleman of Westchester county. There were old-style arms, a set of elk horns worth $200, an easel of boat oars and fishing tackle, panels of lawn tennis racquets, fencing, arching and every sort of sport. They made a very attractive room."—Mail and Express.

Finding the Money.

One of the judicial customs of Russia in the first part of our century was, according to Alexander Verestchagin's "At Home in the War," a system of corporal punishment legally administered. For example: If a landed proprietor found it necessarry to punish his servants or peasants, he sent the culprit with a note to the district judge, and the matter was attended to forthwith. A serf having arrived from a distance to pay the yearly sum of money due from him and his fellows, declares that they can pay only a small proportion of it. The judge speedily appears.

"Who are you? The Olkhoff overseer?" he asks, threateningly, when left alone with the serf.

"Exactly so, my benefactor," replies the latter, dolefully, and bows to the judge's belt.

"You will be pleased to pay the money at once, or you will be thrashed on the spot."

"Dear sir, have mercy!" howls the peasant, and falls at his feet. "As you please, dear sir, but there is no more money."

"Hey, there, policeman!" shouts the judge, opening a door. The policeman makes his appearance. "Where's the porter? Drag him up-stairs!" and he points to the overseer, who is still wallowing about at his feet.

"Dear sir, have mercy! A little can be found."

"A what? Now you sing another song!"

The overseer draws from his breast a rag knotted into a parcel, unties it, and hands forth one bank-bill.

"Well, this is little indeed! Why are you trying to impose upon me? Take him off up-stairs!"

"My own father, my benefactor, dear sir, if you were to kill me, I haven't a kopeck more!"

The porter appears, to assist the policeman.

"Haul him up-stairs, children; and I'll be there directly!" shouts the judge. They drag the overseer out, and lead him up-stairs, while he cries, "Dear sirs, benefactors, if you were to kill me, I haven't another kopeck!"

After a few blows from the switches, he begins to shout. "Stay, orthodox believers, there is a trifle more!"

"Well, stop my brave fellows. Show us what more you have," orders the judge. The overseer takes off one of his shoes and extracts from it another trifle.

"What's that nonsense! Throw him down again, children."

This process is repeated five or six times. The same mode of extracting the rent everywhere prevailed. All day long overseers were brought to the judge, and shrieks resounded.

"Stop, my own fathers, stop! There is still a trifle more!"

Origin of Slang.

A correspondent asks: "Why is it that the word 'rats' has become such popular slang? What is its origin, anyway?" We do not know why "rats became popular unless it is because they have at last decided not to die in the house. The origin of the word "rats," as it is now applied, expressive of disgust or disbelief in a statement, is to be found in Shakespeare. Old Polonius has hidden behind the arras to overhear the conversation held by the darkly brooding prince and his mother. The old man makes a noise, and Hamlet, exclaiming, "A rat—a rat," kills him. In England, there has been no departure from the original. When some one tells the prince of Wales a fish story, his royal highness quietly remarks: "A rat;" but Americans, ever intent upon enlargement, and ever seeking the plural in all things, say "rats." The origin of much of the popular slang of to-day can be traced to Shakespeare. To call a fulsome compliment "taffy" is declared by the London Times to be an Americanism, but it is not. In the first part of Henry IV. occurs this phrase: "A candy deal of courtesy." Americans, seizing upon so gracious a hint, resolved the whole phrase into taffy," which we all know, is candy.

Lives of Great Men All Remind Us.

The late W. W. Corcoran, the Washington philanthropist, preserved with religious care the small tin shoemaker's sign that belonged to his father. He proudly exhibited it along with the rest of his treasures. Few great men try to conceal the humble surroundings of their early life. Every one is familiar with the poverty and early struggles of Lincoln, Clay, Webster and Garfield. Bishop Hall was the son of a farmer. Columbus of a weaver, Whitfield of a tavernkeeper, Cardinal Woolsey of a butcher, Shakespeare of a wool stapler, Cromwell of a brewer and Milton of a note broker. John Bunyan was a tinker, Cincinnatus a farmer, Burns a plowman, Confucius a carpenter, Mahomet a mule-driver and Terrence a slave.—New York Press.

Found on the Battle Field.

A gentleman told me yesterday of a strange experience related by a friend of his. It was during the battle of Gettysburg, that his friend, just before entering the action, took his canteen from his shoulder and hid it in a crevice in the rock. Then came that fiery hail of shot and shell that swept down regiments like fields of grain before the reaper. At the close of the battle the soldier forgot all about his canteen, nor did it ever occur to him again until he visited the field at the last reunion. Then it flashed through his mind, and after a few minutes' search he found it where he had left it on that momentous day. It seems scarcely credible that it could have been overlooked during the minute exploration of the field ever since the war, but the gentleman who related the incident is of unimpeachable veracity.—Albany Argus.

Writing for Ophans.

The following story of the Emperor of Brazil furnishes a good illustration of the character of that gifted monarch. The other day at Cannes the editor of a scientific French journal waited on his Majesty with the request that he would contribute some articles connected with his dominion. "Certainly," replied the Emperor, "but what rate of pay do you give?" The man of letters, though a little surprised, having named what he was in the habit of giving, Dom Pedro added, smiling: "Yes, that will do very well. You see I would gladly write for nothing, but I am not at liberty to do so, as ever since I began writing I have given every penny I have earned by my brain to an orphan asylum in my capital."

Not Out of the Woods.

You've escaped from the mountains or beaches
With something perhaps in your purse,
But forbear yet your confident speeches,
You're in for a contest that's worse.
Though with landlords you sometimes with skill trade,
And a settlement makes that will please,
Yet the coalman will have his fall bill paid,
For unless you come down you may freeze.

The Two Sides of It.

Old gent: "There's the door bell. I suppose that's young De Pooro come to spend the evening with you, and I tell you this thing has got to stop. If you don't give him his walking papers I will this very night."

Daughter: "But, pa, he is in receipt of a good salary, and—

"Salary! What's a salary to a girl brought up as you have been? You should marry a millionaire's son, a man who can support you in the style—"

Servant: "Please, sir, the butcher is at the door, an' he says if you don't pay that bill to-night he'll tell Mr. De Pooro what kind of a scoundrelly family he's in danger o' marryin' into, sir."—Philadelphia Record.

A NARROW VALE.

BY ROBERT G. INGERSOL.

Life is a narrow vale between the cold
And barren peaks of two eternities.
We strive in vain to look beyond the heights.
We cry aloud; the only answer
Is the echo of our wailing cry.
From the voiceless lips of the unreplying dead
There comes no word; but in the night of death
Hope sees a star, and listening love can hear
The rustle of a wing.
These myths were born of hopes, and fears and tears,
And smiles; and they were touched and colored
By all there is of joy and grief between
The rosy dawn of birth and death's sad night
They clothed even the stars with passion,
And gave to gods the faults and frailties
Of the sons of men. In them the winds
And waves were music, and all the lakes and Streams, springs, mountains, woods, and perfumed dells,
Were haunted by a thousand fairy forms.

NIGHT.

The nightingale sent forth an appeal, so passionate, so thrilling, that James closed his book and turned toward the window.

The moon shed upon the land a light soft as though strained through a film of lace; the young shoots which were begining to clothe the light, open branches outlined the most delicate garlands against the pale gray sky; a few masses of black evergreens formed dense shadows here and there, and farther off, the rocks, wet with the rain of the preceding day, shone as if specked with mica under the serene illumination of this Spring night.

James cast his eyes over the well-known and beloved scene, which made almost a part of himself; not a line of the country but was so familiar that he could have pointed, with his eyes closed, to every tree, every bush; there was not one of these paths where his foot had not printed itself in the dust.

How many days and nights of his existence had rolled away there, before that tranquil horizon, in a spot which exaled I know not what breath of freedom and of greatness. Beyond the rocks, beyond the woods, one was conscious of the plains, whose free, balmy air filled with great drafts the lungs of the weary traveller.

The nightingale, which had been silent for a moment, renewed his appeal, intense, nervous, vehement, almosty angry; it was a defiance rather than a prayer. At a distance, among the rocks, another nightingale answered him; his voice, weakened by distance, came like an echo. All at once a third rival launched a vivid note from the neighboring ticket, and all three continued their song without ceasing.

James sighed, left the window, and would have returned to his book, but the garish light of the lamp vexed his eyes after the soft restfulness of the veiled moonlight; he returned to the window, leaned upon his elbow, and yielding little by little to a rising flood of memories, he reviewed the past and reopened his wound.

It was an old wound and it bled still; this little wood, which touched his garden, had seen the growth of his young love; it had also seen the bitter tear of love betrayed, of conquered pride. Five years had rolled away, and yet at each remembrance the wound seemed as fresh as if given yesterday; time had softened the edge of his sorrow, but it had not lessened its depth.

It was there that he loved her! She was young, beautiful, and free to give her hand and her life to whomsoever she chose. Beguiled by her nearness, James had passed with her the long Winter evenings watching her as she worked under the shaded light of the lamp, listening to her as she talked with her old parents, and it would be hard to tell why this young widow, who had hardly tasted life, appeared to him wiser and better instructed than philosophers and learned men.

Was it grief, that in brushing her with his wing, had given her this strange maturity? Was Regina one of those fruits that yield, without the help of the gardener, the quintessence of all flavors and all perfumes? What could disturb the traveller if this fruit hung perpetually before his charmed eyes?

Spring had come after the Winter; their garden gates opened upon the same ground; why was it that they found themselves there at the same time? Why was it that James and Regina, when the old parents, early in bed, were forgetting their cares and their old age in happy dreams, became accustomed to walking side by side in the dark paths which led so gently round the wood and the cliff? Doubtless the nightingales know, and that is why they pass the night in singing.

Their hands met, their eyes had spoken, but their lips said nothing; of what use are promises when the heart feels itself able to keep them all? The catkins of the willows fell, the birches put out their leaves, the arches of the wood filled with leafage, and the nightingales stopped singing. James had said nothing, for Regina was almost rich, and he had only his work, the work of a thinker, who grows old fast and rarely gets money.

One evening the rain had prevented their going out, and he went to see his friend under her lamp, besides her old parents; a visitor presented himself, and, after a short visit, withdrew. It was a suitor favored by her family. Regina could not remain a widow; here was a suitable proposal. They asked James for his advice. With a heart full of bitterness (for he remembered his poverty and his friend said nothing), he recommended the marriage and returned to his home desperate. Was it for him to bind to a life of labor and obscurity this young woman, worthy to shine in the great world? Modest people have their pride. He called himself selfish, flouted his own love as a motive of self-interest; without waiting for the sober judgment of another day he set out on a journey.

When he returned, Regina was no longer there; abandoning the two old people, sorrowful at her absence, she had gone back into the world; true, she was not married, but he did not know that; he knew that she was admired without being told. Who can tell what passed in her mind when James took his flight. Perhaps she too had suffered, but like him she made no complaint.

All this James recalled, while the nightingales were singing in the wood. With a constantly growing bitterness he descended to the gardens, more for mere distraction than in any hope of appeasing his pain; the key of the little gate was always there, well-worn, but always ready. He opened the gate and entered the park-like glade.

The light of the moon projected upon the close turf the shadows of the interlaced branches; the elms were still almost bared of foliage, the hazels were still at the ends of their supple limbs the tender, velvety knots that were soon to burst in leaf; a sweet odor of grass, of buds and moist bark lent its penetrating freshness to the night air; the resolute vigor of youth seemed to float in the atmosphere and to penetrate the very marrow. It was one of those nights when one is full of courage, and would like to set out to conquer the world, when one is ready to undertake anything that is grand and noble.

He wandered about for a time, the bitterness which had oppressed him changing little by little to a more resigned, more ideal grief, when he heard a step upon the gravel. It was a lonely place, but nothing evil had ever appeared there; the little town had been long asleep; James stopped and listened. A gray gown passed before him and moved toward the other gate, that of Regina; he rapidly advanced toward the young woman, who turned around in alarm.

"James!" she murmured, recognizing him. She rested her hand against a tree-trunk for support, trembling with the sudden shock and rising emotion and remained silent, half-hidden by the lower branches of lilacs.

He was afraid to speak, fearing that he was dreaming, and that the image so beloved would vanish; all his bitterness had suddenly disappeared, giving place to an intense and silent joy.

"You are here!" he said at last, very softly; it seemed to him that the sound of his own voice must pain his ears.

"Yes, since morning, my old parents are ill and sad." Her head drooped; they had been ill and sad for a long time, but she had not dared to visit them before, fearing, perhaps, an inevitable meeting.

"You are alone in this wood, at night?" he asked, with a lingering suspicion; does your husband leave you to go out alone?"

"I come out to listen to the nightengales," Regina answered gently; "they sing so sweetly. I am not married," she added in a lower voice."

Dizzy with joy, James suddenly perceived that this hour was to form an era in his life.

"The nightingales used to sing just so sweetly," he said, with sudden boldness, "but that did not prevent your going away."

She shook her head sadly and moved along the narrow path; they had left the hazelwood, and were taking their way under the shadowy pines, in the perfume of their resinous breath.

"It was not I who went away," she said at last. A ray of light which crossed an opening showed James her sweet countenance, a little thin, but as beautiful as ever and a hundred times more charming.

"It was I, I admit it, but I did it that I might not bind you—that I might leave you free—"

"Alas!" she cried, pressing her nervous hands together, "am I free?" Is one free when the heart is given, when—"

She stopped; her trembling lips refused to speak.

"You love me then?" said James without daring to look at her.

"Yes, I loved you! I can tell you now that years have ended it all, now that I have learned to endure. But the test has been a cruel one! Why did you force this martyrdom upon me? From pride, no doubt. Ah! you men; you have more pride than love, while we—"

"You have no pride, you women! It was not pride that made you keep silence! It was for you to speak, you who are richer and of more importance than I, poor devil that I am!"

"Pride, always pride!" repeated Regina, sadly. "You knew that I loved you; that was not enough! I must tell you so? Go, now; it is your punishment to know too late the heart that you have lost."

"Lost?" he demanded, not in despair, as he should have been, but full of a joyful rapture. "Lost? You do not love me now?"

"No!" she said, turning away her head.

"And I—I adore you, Regina!" he cried, suddenly taking her hands. "Are you satisfied, proud lady? I have spent five years in abusing you, in abusing myself, in weeping for you; and you—you no longer love me. Are you avenged?"

She turned her head to hide the tears that streamed down her face.

"You are avenged; you are satisfied. And now what do you say to me?"

"My husband!" she cried, hiding her flowing tears upon James' shoulder.

Slowly they returned by the path thickly strewn with fragrant pine needles; the branches of the thorn shook down upon them their perfumed petals; the interlaced boughs opened a pathway for them; all the wood seemed to welcome them returning together as before.

"I believe, after all," said Regina at the moment of separating, "I believe it is worth while to have suffered. We are better, and we love each other better.

He pressed once more her hand, and she disappeared behind that door which was always open for him henceforth. At this moment his neighbor, the nightingale, unafrighted by his presence, launched upon the still air a keen shower of triumphant notes, and his rivals answered him from the distance; for an instant all joined their voices in one loud hymn of joy.—Translated from the French of Henry Greenville.

Would it be proper to speak of the wickerwork around a demijohn as a spirit wrapper?

A contemporary heads an article "An Incorrigible Preacher's Son." This looks like visiting the sins of the children on the father.

There are two periods in a woman's life when she does not love to talk. When one is we never knew, and the other we have forgotten.

Charlie was playing on the lawn; his mother had to call him three times before he came reluctantly into the house. I am glad we don't live in Utah!" he muttered as he entered the door. "Well, William," said Mr. Hardhead to his new confidential clerk, "you are in a first-class position now at a good salary. I shall expect you to be faithful and diligent; in fact, to make all my interests your own. It won't be necessary, however, for you to make love to the type-writer. It is as good as settled that James Whitcomb Riley will be the poet laureate of the next administration. Perhaps there may be more popular selections made for the places that the president will have to fill, but we doubt it. While the Hoosier poet writes the songs of the country it won't make so much difference who administers the laws, if there's any wisdom in the old saying.—Boston Herald.

The man whose love was so strong as not to be lessened by the stories told of the artificial means employed by his inamorata to make up for the paucity of nature's provisions, remarked to his unwelcome counsellers: "With all her false I love her still." "I suppose so," cynically returned one of his tormentors, "but then she will not be apt to keep still; her tongue wasn't designed for that purpose."

Boston Advertiser.

A recent writer on college girls tells an interesting story of the trials and difficulties of five plucky young women who had little money, but a plenty determination to get an education. "A large-eyed brunette," says the writer, "not sturdy, but fragile-looking, graduated from Boston university a few years ago by finding a situation as waitress in a restaurant, wearing the apron during the rush hours at morning and night, and in vacation season the day through. One group of four girls, two from Boston university, and two at the Harvard Annex, engaged two adjoining rooms in a quiet house in Boston, and boarded themselves on an average of $3,70 per week. Their rooms cost $5, or $1.25 each. They took breakfast at a small restaurant, where oatmeal and steak cost 20 cents. They ate an apple and a slice of bread for lunch, and at night they pooled resources, spreading napkins on the top of a trunk and feasting on bread and milk, or bread and a taste of canned meats. Once a neighbor surreptiously inserted into the bureau drawer six glasses of jelly, which served as a commissary department, and then they dined royally for days, and not one of them suffered in health by the experiment. Their expenses for clothing were no greater in proportion. One member of the quartette possessed a single gown, a well-worn black cashmere. Being invited to a professor's reception one evening, she remained away from a day's recitation while she sat in a cloak and petticoat, cleaning and pressing and refreshing with ribbons her only apparel. At night she enjoyed herself quite as thoroughly as the rest of the company.

England, Bismarck and the United States.

From the Forum.

England's fall indeed, would be the severest blow that could be inflicted, not only upon the Anglo-Saxon race, but upon mankind in general. The consequences of such a calamity would under the present circumstances, prove fatal just now when Eastern and central Europe—threatened by the black clouds of mediæval feudalism, and tempted by a statesman whose luck is equal to his astuteness, to tread the gloomy path of retrogression—have only England, the nearest becon light of liberty, to look up to. Heaven forbid that the waves should close upon this Pharos, for the light of the great Republic across the ocean reaches but feebly the old mother continent, and the time is as yet far off when the power of the English speaking race will outweigh that of all the rest of the world —as is said by an enthusiastic writer.

CONGRESSIONAL.

Weekly Resume of the Proceedings of the Senate and House.

Monday, Dec. 10.

SENATE:—Senator Farwell introduced a bill to increase the salaries of the judges of the supreme court of the United States. It provides: The salary of the chief justice of the court shall be $20,500 per year, and that of each of the associate justices $20,000. The retiring pensions shall remain as at present, $10,000.

Senator Jones of Arkansas introduced the Gifford bill to amend the act opening the Great Sioux reservation. John H. King of Rapid City and ex-Congressman Kleiner will push the bill and are very cheerful of the outlook. They are delighted with the strong position taken by the Sioux commission in its report and believe that it will have a great effect upon congress.

The senate committee on public lands reported back Mr. Berry's bill to allow persons who have abandoned or relinquished their homestead entries to make another entry with minor amendments and a favorable recommendation.

HOUSE:—Among the bills introduced were by one Mr. Dubois, of Idaho, for the admission of the State; and one by Mr. McAdoo, of New Jersey, proposing a constitutional amendment for uniformity as to the day of chosing presidential electors and forbidding voting for any other officer than representatives in congress on that day.

Mr. Holman offered for immediate consideration a resolution reciting the charges made in the public prints that money had been used to control presidential elections, and instructing the judiciary committee to investigate the charges and to inquire what legislation might be necessary to preserve the purity of franchise. Mr. Dingley, of Maine, offered an amendment to the resolution, inserting the following words: "And also whether officials of the United States have made contributions to such fund."

Tuesday, Dec. 11.

SENATE.—The senate resumed consideration of the tariff bill. Mr. Vest, referring to Mr. Sherman's speech denied the assertion that the election had settled the question of tariff legislation.

HOUSE.—The house went into committee of the whole on the direct tax bill. Mr. Hopkins of Illinois spoke in support of the measure and in opposition of the proposed amendment refunding the cotton tax. Mr. Allen of Mississippi could find no warrant in the constitution for refunding the direct tax. Mr. Seney of Ohio supported the bill, whose purpose, he said, had been grossly misrepresented.

Mr. Whiting of Michigan opposed the bill as being unconstitutional and unjust. Mr. Enloe of Tennessee declared that the bill was sustained neither by law nor by precedent, denounced it as a subterfuge and a fraud and charged that its aim was to perpetuate the power of trusts to exact tribute from the people by means of a high tariff.

Wednesday Dec. 12.

SENATE:—The senate continued the discussion of the tariff bill, and incidentally discussed civil service reform and the recent election.

Mr. Riddleberger gave notice that he would move every morning to take up his resolution for the consideration, in open session, of the British extradition law.

HOUSE.—The event in the house to-day was the passage of the direct tax bill, by a vote of 178 to 96. Of the Minnesota members Lind, MacDonald and Nelson voted for the bill, and Wilson against it. Rice did not vote.

Mr. Rogers, of Arkansas, from the committee on the judiciary, reported a resolution, which was adopted, calling on the attorney general for information as to where any delay in the administration of law in the United States courts will result from the clause in the bill providing for the payment of marshals, restricting the sum which must be advanced to them. Mr. Blanchard, of Louisiana, reported the river and harbor bill, and it was referred to the committee of the whole.

Thursday, Dec. 13.

SENATE.—The senate committee on Indian affairs attempted to hold a meeting to-day for the consideration of the new Sioux bill, but could not get a quorum. It was considered best by those present, however that Senator Dawes should ask the interior department for a full transcript of the proceedings in all the councils held with the Sioux, and when the senate met a resolution to that effect offered by Senator Dawes was agreed to.

HOUSE.—The senate committee on education gave a hearing to delegates of the Sabbath convention, in support of the Sunday rest bill.

The consular and diplomatic appropriation bill has been practically completed by the house committee on foreign affairs. It does not differ materially from the bill for the present year, which appropriated $1,419,942. The legislative, executive and judicial appropriation bill has been completed by the subcommittee of the house appropriation committee, and is now in the hands of the full committee. It will follow closely the line of the present bill.

The house Democratic caucus after a session lasting over three hours, adopted a resolution for the admission into the Union of Dakota, either as one or two states, as the people of Dakota shall decide, and for the admission of the States of Washington, Montana and New Mexico also. It is proposed that these states shall be admitted by one bill. Utah, although not mentioned in the resolution, it was agreed should be admitted into the Union, but by a separate bill.

Friday, Dec. 14.

SENATE.—As Senator Davis predicted some days ago, the conference committees of the two houses on the bill for the civilization of the Minnesota Chippewas had no difficulty in coming to an agreement over the bill. The committee came together to-day and reached an agreement in an hour. The chief cause of difference was that the senate inserted a provision in the bill requiring any agreement made with the Indians to be submitted to congress for ratification.

The provisions of the bill regarding the Indians on the Red Lake and White Earth reservations are purely arbitrary, their lands being opened to settlement without negotiation. Their reservations were set aside by executive order, and not by treaty; and Mr. Nelson, who framed the bill, said that negotitions with them were not necessary.

HOUSE.—There is a consensus of opinion among the members of the house committee on manufactures that no legislation as to trusts can be secured during the short life time of the present congress, and all that it will be possible for the committee to accomplish will be to secure information that will be in use of the future.

The legislative, executive and judicial appropriation bill, as reported to the house, carries with it an appropriation of $20,802,245, being $138,195 less than the bill for the current fiscal year and $285,240 less than the estimates. The bill is the least interesting of any legislative appropriation bill for many years. No new officers are created and the bills almost entirely of a routine character. The board of pension appeals is reduced from six members to three, and three law clerks in the office of the secretary of the interior are dropped.

The Extreme of Amiability and Patience.

New York Sun.

Mlle. Sarah Bernhardt, who is supposed not to lack gall to make oppression bitter, tells a Vienna interviewer that she has lived on terms of friendship and without quarrel with her dressmaker for many years. This seems to be the extreme of amiability and patience. How many men, for instance, can put their hands on their hearts and swear that they have maintained unbroken cordial relations with their tailors for a decade? A jutting collar, a coat sleeve too long, a pair of gibbous-kneed trousers, will make the most long-suffering man turn and rend his tailor. Let the sad truth be murmured: Men folks are not so amiable as Mlle. Bernhardt. But the tailor has his revenge. He can turn and rend his customer with his bills.

It is reported that the American friends of the king of Wurtemburg, Jackson, Hendry and Woodcock, will returned to royal favor, or at least to residence in the kingdom, after the changes in the ministry which is expected to take place almost immediately.

BLOODY RIOT IN ALABAMA.

Lynchers Repulsed from a Jail in Alabama With a Loss of Fifteen or Twenty Lives.

This is a Birmingham, Alabama, telegram of Dec., 8th. Since the discovery of the identity of the murdered girl, May Hawes, and the fact that her mother was missing, it has been suspected that the latter was also murdered. The body of the missing woman was found at the bottom of a lake in the park, half a mile from the cottage where the family had lived and five miles from East lake, where the body of little May Hawes was found. The head of the dead woman had been crushed by a blow with an ax and the body was kept at the bottom of the lake by two hundred pounds of iron fastened about her neck, feet and waist. In addition to finding the body, other circumstantial evidence has been found against Dick Hawes, the husband of the dead woman. A mob advanced on the jail at midnight for the purpose of lynching Hawes. The officer fired several volleys into the mob. Nine men were killed and many wounded. Among the killed was the postmaster of this place.

The mob made an attack on the jail at 11:30 p. m.. As they approached the alley way leading to the jail, the officers called to them to halt which they did. The officers then fired with Winchesters and pistols, and the firing was terrific for fifteen minutes on both sides. None of the officers were injured, but over twenty of the mob were killed and wounded. Among the wounded is M. B. Throckmorton, postmaster of Birmingham, who was endeavoring to persuade the mob to disperse. Adolph Shiebe, of the Louisville & Nashville railroad, was also fatally wounded in the neck. The patrol wagon carted off the dead and wounded to the hospital. The firing was commenced by the police, but equally as many shots were fired by the mob. Over five hundred rounds were fired. The rifles, zouaves and guards are now in possession of all the streets leading to the jail. Inside the jail the bullets fired by the mob whistled around those confined there. Sheriff Smith gave the order to fire. No further attack is anticipated. A desultory fire was kept up for half an hour. Hawes, the murderer, was indifferent throughout the riot.

LATER ACCOUNTS.

BIRMINGHAM, Dec. 9.—When the crowd which had been collecting on the streets for several hours advanced on the county jail with the intention of lynching R. R. Hawes, charged with the murder of his wife and child, many of the best citizens tried to reason with them and prevent trouble and some lost their lives in the attempt. When the crowd was within a few feet on the jail door and had failed to heed numerous warnings, the officers opened fire on them, killing three men instantly, fatally wounding seven and wounding more or less seriously about thirty others.

[A list of names follows showing thirteen deaths to date, with more to follow.]

THE SHERIFF CENSURED.

It is generally believed that the recklessness and haste of the sheriff in giving the command to fire was assassination, and it is stated on all sides that the immense gathering was not for the purpose at all of forcing the jail, but rather out of curiosity. There was never any real danger of an assault. There is no calm in the public mind, and the excitement is far greater than heretofore. In the light of the night's terrors, the Hawes affair has almost disappeared, and the indignation expressed is directed against Sheriff Smith and the posse who let go the fearful volley. And the city is a military encampment. Col. Jones of Montgomery, with two military companies is absolutely in charge of affairs. The jail is guarded by state troops with picket lines extended several squares in every direction, and at each approach there frowns the countenance of a gatling gun. Mounted scouts are sent out of the city, and at regular intervals acquaint Col. Jones with the condition of the public mind and prospects of an armed rising by the people. Fire bells sound military alarms and soldiers in uniform and armed with Winchester rifles have desolated the principal streets and driven back the thousands who have all day been looking toward the jail. In the meanwhile citizens have not kept within doors. They have congregated in hotels, or on the street corners and in front of bulletin boards. The streets has been a living maddened mass, and very little oratorical pyrotechnics could readily organize a mob whose solemn duty would be declared to be to avenge the murderer of the popular Mr. Throckmorton and those who fell by him. All along the walls of the city are posted petitions of various kinds, signed by thousands of people. One of these recites at length the fact that Sheriff Smith had butchered in cold blood some of the best citizens of Birmingham by an act as unprovoked as unnecessary, and asked Gov. Seay to immediately relieve him of his duties as sheriff. Another petition side by side reads, "This is to hang him," and was signed by thousands of passers by. The military were called upon to arrest Smith and others implicated, but this was refused, and finally a citizen went before a justice of the peace and swore out a warrant for the arrest of Smith and his deputies on the charge of murder. This was served by the coroner, who found Smith in jail, and the coroner himself took charge of the jail and in his custody that institution is at present.

There are already ten military companies under command of Col. Jones, and five others will arrive on special trains by midnight. The famous Montgomery Greys, the equally famous True Blues, the Montgomery Mounted Rifles, under command of Hon. A. A. Wiley, member of the present legislature, and an artillery company in charge of Gatling gun have arrived here from the capitol city. Besides these, companies from Tuscaloosa, Opelika, Greenville and Anniston and other Alabama cities came. One precaution against undue excitement and consequent violence was taken by the city council, which in special session ordered that all saloons and drug stores be closed until further notice.

SMITH TALKS.

As to the occurrences of last night, Sheriff said:

We begged and pleaded with the crowd to keep back and then they fired the first shot. Several shots were fired by the crowd before I gave the order to fire. We begged them to halt at the mouth of the alley, and still they kept coming on. We begged them to go back, and time and again warned them that we would shoot, but they would not listen to us. They came half-way up the alley, close to the jail door, and shouted, "blow up the jail with dynamite." After all this and after they opened fire, I gave the order to fire. They continued firing after we ceased. I feel that we could have not done anything else under the circumstances, and I deeply regret the necessity.

Report of the Indian Commission.

The formal report of the Sioux commission is made public with the bound copies of the annual report of the secretary of the interior, and contains a comprehensive history of the commission's effort to carry out the provisions of the act throwing open to settlement the great expanse of country known as the Sioux reservation. The commission is decidedly severe in its criticism on the progress of Indian civilization, and emphatically asserts that stern and vigorous measures are from this on absolutely essential to a solution of the Indian problem. The first question to be settled is that of making these people self-supporting.

"A continuation of the practice of feeding and clothing these people in idleness," says the commission, "at the expense of millions of dollars per annum will prove a needless burden upon the tax payers of the country and the ruin of the Indians themselves. There is no reason why, if industrious white men can live in Dakota, these Indians cannot take the entire burden of their support from the shoulders of the white people."

The commission is of the opinion that one of the great hindrances to the advance of civilization is the great quantity of beef furnished the Indians.

The number of cattle slaughtered on the reservation annually is simply enormous. For years the annual consumption of beef has been 28,000 head for the feeding of less than 28,000 Indians. New systems of giving out rations should be adopted by the government that will allow these Indians an opportunity to remain upon their farms. The treaty terms allow the substitution of bacon and pork for beef and the commission thinks that in the interest of good health and decency as well as to do away with the horrors which surround a beef-killing day at the agencies it would be well to make this substitution of vegetables, which sanitary conditions among the Indians demand, should be fed them. The failure of the commission to secure the assent leaves the question of opening this vast reservation useless because of uncultivated land unsettled. The growth of Dakota, and the increase of its population which would entitle the territory to four representatives in congress were the territory admitted as a state, demands an early settlement of the question. Under the circumstances the commission thinks that to bring about the civilization of these Indians the reservation should at once be surveyed the Indians required to take their lands by allotment and go to work upon them, the surplus land being sold off; that they should be compelled to send their children to school; that rations and annuities should be firmly withheld from those who wilfully refuse to comply with these requirements; that all Indians complying should be given annuities and necessary rations and implements promptly; that all dealings between the government, its agents and the Indians should be with them as individuals, and chiefs as such should in no wise be recognized. Then the reservation should be opened to settlement so that railroads and other public improvements may be encouraged and the civilizing influences of the whites be felt.

The Indiana Election Scandal.

There will be three election indictments ready for the United States grand jury to pass upon when it resumes its sitting at Indianapolis. It is thought, however, that the evidence relative to the charges against Col. W. W. Dudley is not far enough advanced to warrant any definite action against him at that time. The original letter in which, it is alleged, the advice to bribe appears hasn't been produced. At the outset of this investigation several Democrats, notably Judge Claypool, Judge Ayres and John W. Murphy, appealed to the committee of one hundred to take the matter up. The officers of the committee expressed a willingness and readiness to do so, but insisted on having the evidence the gentleman named had secured presented to them; but the Democrats declined to put others in possession of what they had. Since the grand jury investigation began the committee has been several times solicited to commence the gathering of evidence at a point reached by the others who have been pursuing it, but at each renewal of the request the committee has insisted that the first evidence it must have is the letter. Mr. Murphy went to Capt. Ritter, attorney of the committee, and urged that he give his assistance to the examination. "I told him," said the captain, "that if he would bring me the letter and the envelope in which it was sent through the mail I would have something to go upon. With that to guide me I am willing now to give all the assistance I can, but without it the investigation would be futile. When we have the evidence to begin on and are promised the support of all good citizens in the matter the committee of 100 will undertake the work of prosecuting Col. Dudley, but we cannot do it without the fact which others say they possess."

Hanging of a Matricide.

Francis Asbury Hawkins was hanged at Riverland, R. I. The village of Islip was startled Oct. 2, 1887, by the news that Mrs. Cynthia Ann Hawkins had been found murdered on the Wellwood road, near Brentwood cemetery. Some persons on their way to church found the body of a woman among some brushes on the road-sides. Eliphalet Snedeker, a livery stable keeper at Bayshore, discovered a pool of blood on the floor of his carriage house, at the spot where a buggy used by Asbury Hawkins the night before had stood, and which had been taken away again by the young man. He stoutly denied any knowledge of his mother's murder, until the pistol with which he had shot her, was found in a horse pond at the rear of Snedeker's stables, where he had thrown it on his return with the buggy the night of the murder. The evidence against him was completed by the finding of blood on the seat and floor of the buggy, and upon the robes and cushions. The coroner's inquest resulted in a verdict of murder against young Hawkins. An hour after the inquest, Hawkins made a confession. He said: "I drove toward my aunt's, Mrs. Smith. After talking a little while, we both became excited, and my mother applied vile epithets to Miss Schreck, which enraged me, and I drew the pistol and shot her in the head. She lay back in the buggy and groaned. I drove on toward Bayshore, and, finding she was not dead, I shot her again. I shot her a third time on the Brentwood road, then threw her out into the bushes, where she was found." Hawkins was connected with nearly every family of prominence in the county.

Career of a Wisconsin Impostor.

Three and one-half years ago George Barney, a young and highly respected farmer of Kinnickinic, Wis., died of quick consumption leaving a wife and two small children. He willed his entire property, both real and personal, to his wife, Mrs. Ida Barney. Mr. Barney had inherited part of this property from his grandfather, owing to the absence of his father, who was supposed to be dead and who would have been the first heir by law. A year ago a man presented himself at the home of Mrs. Barney, claiming to be the father of her departed husband and asked the privilege of sharing in a few of the comforts of the home of his departed son. After some hesitancy his request was granted without requiring him to give further proof of his identity. During the last six or eight months he has been getting overbearing and often tried to make trouble between Mrs. Barney and her neighbors, and has had several quarrels with some of the neighbors himself. Finally, he made claim to the farm, but condescended to divide the proceeds if Mrs. Barney would sell the same. This Mrs. Barney refused to do, preferring to take her chances with the law. During her absence he took possession of the house, and on her return refused admission, having armed himself with a Winchester rifle and a six-shooter. However, at the earnest request of a goodly crowd of brave and well armed neighbors, who gave him but a few short hours to make his exit, he concluded to shed no blood. He took the first train from River Falls, and the last that was heard from him was at Black River Falls. If he ever shows up in this section again the "White Caps" will be here also.

Killed By a Chinamen.

An inquest was begun at Butte, Montana, on John Braden, who died from the effects of an injury received from a Chinaman. He was passing through an alley where a Chinamen was sawing wood. Braden had been drinking, and must have done some act upon the Chinamen. His friends with him claim he chucked the Chinaman under the chin and said: "Hello, John! How are you coming on with your wood-sawing?" He then drew the saw, and struck Braden on the back of the neck, missing the vertebra and the jugular vein. The blow caused a great loss of blood, and Braden was sent to the hospital, but the wound was not thought dangerous. Braden died the next night. The police are looking for the boy who claims he saw Braden knock the Chinaman down but have not found him yet. The theory that Braden must have offered the Chinamen violence is generally believed except by the hoodlum element, to which Braden belonged. Fifty special police were sworn in as it is apprehended that the tough element may make reprisals on the Chinese residents of whom a great many are in the city. The Chinaman was not found who did the deed, and it is suspected he has been spirited away by his friends, and to be beyond reach. Accurate description has been furnished the officers surrounding the place, and the sheriff's officers are out in every direction, with little hope of catching him. Braden is a young man about twenty-three unmarried, and a miner by occupation.

A Question of Naturalization.

Col. Habercorn sends the following to the Milwaukee Herald (German): The Democrats may find they have two names on the roll of their members of the next house who will not be sworn in. Wisconsin elected only two Democrats to the next house, both German Americans. It is asserted that both were ineligible because neither of them is an American citizen. They came to this country as minors with their fathers, and they claim that the latter became full American citizens before they themselves reached their majority. This is disputed. It is asserted that the father of Mr. Brickner, who was elected from the Fifth district, never was naturalized, and it is at least suspected that the same is true of the father of Mr. Barwig, who was elected from the Second district. In Wisconsin foreigners of sufficient age acquire the right to vote after a year's residence and the declaration of intention to become citizens. It is this provision of law that has prevented many other residents of that state from having themselves naturalized. If this is the case with the two fathers of the two gentlemen named, then they are not citizens, and consequently not eligible to congress. The law prescribes that a foreign-born person must have been seven years a citizen before he is eligible to a seat in the house. When Messrs. Barwig and Brickner present themselves at the bar of the house to be sworn in as members they will be challenged, and consequently had better find proofs of their citizenship if such exist.

THEY ARE IMMORTAL.

What Rev. Dr. Talmage has to say About Our Departed Friends, Who Still Live.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Dec. 9.—The Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D. D., preached to-day on "Our Departed Still Living." His text was Genesis xlv, 27, 28: "And when he saw the wagons which Joseph had sent to carry him, the spirit of Jacob their father revived. And Israel said, It is enough; Joseph my son is yet alive." Dr. Talmage said:

The Egyptian capital was the focus of the world's wealth. In ships and barges, there had been brought to it from India frankincense, and cinnamon, and ivory, and diamonds; from the North, marble and iron; from Syria, purple and silk; from Greece, some of the finest horses of the world, and some of the most brilliant chariots; and from all the earth that which could best please the eye, and charm the ear, and gratify the taste. There were temples aflame with red sandstone entered by gateways that were guarded by pillars bewildering with hieroglyphics, and wound with brazen serpents, and adorned with winged creatures—their eyes, and beaks, and pinions glittering with precious stones. There were marble columns blooming into white flower-buds; there were stone pillars, at the top bursting into the shape of the locust when in full bloom. Along the avenues, lined with sphinx, and fane, and obelisk, there were princes who came in gorgeously upholstered palanquin, carried by servants in scarlet, or elsewhere drawn by vehicles, the snow-white horses, golden-bitted and six abreast, dashing at full run. There were fountains from stone-wreathed vases climbing the ladders of the light. You would hear a bolt shove, and a door of brass would open like a flash of the sun. The surrounding gardens were saturated with odors that mounted the terrace, and dripped from the arbors and burned their incense in the Egyptian noon. On floors of mosaic the glories of Pharaoh were spelled out in letters of porphyry, and beryl, and flame. There were ornaments twisted from the wood of the tamarisk, embossed with silver breaking into foam. There were footstools made out of a single precious stone. There were beds fashioned out of a crouched lion in bronze. There were chairs spotted with the sleek hide of leopards. There were sofas footed with the claws of wild beasts, and armed with the beaks of birds. As you stand on the level beach of the sea on a summer day, and look either way, and there are miles of breakers, white with the ocean foam, dashing shoreward; so it seemed as if the sea of the world's pomp and wealth in the Egyptian capital for miles and miles flung itself up into white breakers of marble temple, mausoleum and obelisk.

This was the place where Joseph, the shepherd boy, was called to stand next to Pharaoh in honor. What a contrast between this scene and his humble starting, and the pit into which his brothers threw him! Yet he was not forgetful of his early home; he was not ashamed of where he came from. The Bishop of Mentz, descended from a wheelwright, covered his house with spokes and hammers and wheels; and the King of Sicily, in honor of his father, who was a potter, refused to drink out of anything but an earthern vessel. So Joseph was not ashamed of his early surroundings, or of his old-time father, or of his brothers. When they came up from the famine-stricken land to get corn from the king's corn crib, Joseph, instead of chiding them for the way they had maltreated and abused him, sent them back with wagons, which Pharaoh furnished, laden with corn; and old Jacob, the father, in the very same wagons, was brought back that Joseph, the son, might see him and give him a comfortable home all the rest of his days.

Well, I hear the wagons, the kings's wagons, rumbling down in front of the palace. On the outside of the palace, to see the wagons go off, stands Pharaoh in royal robes; and beside him Prime Minister Joseph, with a chain of gold around his neck, and on his hand a ring given by Pharaoh to him so that any time he wanted to stamp the royal seal upon a document he could do so. Wagon after wagon rolls on down from the palace, laden with corn, and meat, and changes of raiment, and everything that could help a famine-struck people. One day I see aged Jacob seated in front of his house. He is possibly thinking of his absent boys (sons, however old they get, are never to a father any more than boys); and while he is seated there, he sees dust arising, and he hears wagons rumbling, and he wonders what is coming now, for the whole land had been smitten with the famine, and was in silence. But after a while the wagons have come near enough, and he sees his sons on the wagons, and before they come quite up they shout "Joseph is yet alive!" The old man faints dead away. I do not wonder at it. The boys tell the story how that the boy, the long-absent Joseph, has to be the first man in the Egyptian palace. While they unload the wagons, the wan and wasted creatures in the neighborhood come up and ask for a handful of corn and they are satisfied.

One day the wagons are brought up, for Jacob, the old father, is about to go to see Joseph in the Egyptian palace. You know it is not a very easy thing to transplant an old tree, and Jacob has hard work to get away from the place where he has lived so long. He bids goodbye to the old place, and leaves his blessing with the neighbors, and then his sons steady him, while he, determined to help himself, gets into the wagon, stiff, old, and decrepit. Yonder they go, Jacob and his sons, and their wives and their children, 82 in all, followed by herds and flocks, which the heards-men drive along. They are going out from famine to luxuriance; they are going from a plain country home to the finest palace under the sun. Joseph, the prime minister, gets in his chariot and drives down to meet the old man. Joseph's charioteer holds up the horses on the one side—the dust-covered wagons of the emigrants stop on the other. Joseph, instead of waiting for his father to come, leaps out of the chariot and jumps into the emigrants' wagon, throws his arms around the old man, and weeps aloud for past memories and present joy. The father, Jacob, can hardly think it is his boy. Why, the smooth brow of childhood has become a wrinkled brow, wrinkled with the cares of state, and the garb of the shepherd boy has become a robe royally bedizened! But as the old man finds out it is actually Joseph, I see the thin lip quiver against the toothless gum as he cries out: "Now let me die, since I have seen thy face; behold, Joseph is yet alive!" The wagons roll up in front of the palace. Help out the grandchildren and take them in out of the hot Egyptian sun. Help old Jacob out of the wagon. Send word to Pharaoh that the old shepherd has come. In the royal apartment Pharaoh and Jacob meet—dignity and rusticity—the gracefulness of the court and the plain manners of the field. The king, wanting to make the old countryman at ease, and seeing how white his beard is, and how feeble his step, looks familiary into his face, and says to the aged man: "How old art thou?" Give the old man a seat. Unload the wagon; drive out the cattle towards the pastures of Goshen. Let the slaves in scarlet kneel and wash the feet of the newly-arrived, wiping them on the finest linen of the palace. From vases of perfume let the newly-arrived be sprinkled and refreshed; let minstrels come in with sandals of crimson, and thrum the harps, and clap the cymbals, and jingle the tambourines, while we sit down at this great distance of time and space, and learn the lesson of the King's wagons.

My friends, we are in a world by sin famine-struck, but the King is in constant communication with us, his wagons coming and going perpetually, and in the rest of my discourse I will show you what the wagons bring and what they take back.

In the first place, like those that came from the Egyptian palace, the King's wagons now bring us corn and meat, and many changes of raiment. We are apt to think of the fields and the orchards as feeding us; but who makes the flax grow for the linen, and the wheat for the bread, and the wool on the sheeps back? Oh, I wish that we could see through every grain field, by every sheep-fold, under the trees of every orchard, the Kings wagons. They drive up three times a day—morning, noon and night. They bring furs from the artic, they bring fruits from the tropic, they bring bread from the temperate zone. The King looks out and he says: "There are twelve hundred millions of people to be fed and clothed. So many pounds of meat, so many barrels of flour, so many yards of cloth and linen and flannel, so many hats, so many socks, so many shoes; enough for all, save that we who are greedy get more shoes than belong to us, and others go barefooted. None but a God could feed and clothe the world. None but a king's corn crib could appease the world's famine. None but a king could tell how many wagons to send, and how heavily to load them, and when they are to start. They are coming over the frozen ground today. Do you not hear their rumbling? They will stop at noon at your table. Oh, if for a little while they should cease, hunger would come into the nations, as to Utica when Hamilcar besieged it, and as in Jerusalem when Vespasian surrounded it, and the nations would be hollow eyed, and fall upon each other in universal cannibalism, and skeleton would drop upon skeleton; and there would be no one to bury the dead, flock after flock, without any carcasses to devour; and the earth in silence would wheel around, one great black hearse. All life stopped because the King's wagons are stopped. Oh, thank God for bread—for bread!

I remark again, that like those that came from the Egyptian's palace, the Kings wagons bring us good news; Jacob had not heard from his boy for a good many years. He never thought of him but with a heartache. There was in Jacob's heart a room where lay the corpse of his unburied Joseph; and when the wagons came, the King's wagons, and told him that Joseph was yet alive, he faints dead away. Good news for Jacob! Good news for us! The King's wagons come down and tell us that our Joseph-Jesus is yet alive: that he has forgiven us because we threw him into a pit of suffering and the dungeon of shame. He has risen from thence to stand in a palace. The Bethlehem shepherds were awakened at midnight by the rattling of the wagons that brought the tidings. Our Joseph-Jesus sends as a message of pardon, of life, of heaven; corn for our hunger, raiment for our nakedness. Joseph-Jesus is yet alive!

I go to hunt up Jesus. I go to the village of Bethany and say: "Where does Mary live?" They say: "Yonder Mary lives." I go in. I see where she sat in the sitting-room. I go out where Martha worked in the kitchen, but I find no Jesus. I go into Pilate's court room, and I find the judges and the police and the prisoner's box, but no Jesus. I go into the Arimathean cemetery, but the door is gone, and the shroud is gone, and Jesus is gone. By faith I look up to the King's palace; and behold I have found him! Joseph-Jesus is still alive! Glorious religion, a religion, a religion made out of death's heads, and cross-bones, and undertaker's screw-driver, but one bounding with life, and sympathy, and gladness. Joseph is yet alive!

I know that my Remember lives.
What comfort this sweet sentence givest
He lives, He lives, who once was dead,
He lives, my ever-living Head.

He lives to grant me daily breath,
He lives, and I shall conquer death.
He lives my mansions to prepare,
He lives to bring me safely there.

He lives, all glory to his name;
He lives, my Jesus, still the same,
Oh, the sweet joy this sentence gives,
I know that my Redeemer lives.

The King's wagons will after a while unload, and they will turn around, and they will go back to the palace, and I really think that you and I will go with them. The King will not leave us in this famine-struck world. The King has ordered that we be lifted into the wagons, and that we go over into Goshen where there shall be pasturage for our largest flocks of joy, and then we will drive up to the palace, where there are glories awaiting us which will melt all the snow of Egyptian marble into forgefulness.

Oh, the joy of meeting our brother, Joseph-Jesus! After we have talked about him for 10, or 50, or 70 years, to talk with him, and to clasp hands with the hero of the ages; not crouching as underlings in his presence, but as Jacob and Joseph hug each other. We will want some new term by which to address him. On earth we call him Saviour, or Redeemer, or friend, but when we throw our arms around him in overlasting embrace, we will want some new name of endearment. I can think of what we shall do through the long ages of eternity; but what we shall do the first minute I can not guess. In the first flash of his countenance, in the first rush of our emotions, what we shall do I cannot imagine. Oh the overwhelming glory of the first 60 seconds in Heaven! Methinks we will just stand, and look and look and look.

The King's wagons took Jacob up to see his lost boy, and so I really think that the King's wagons will take us up to see our lost kindred. How long is it since Joseph went out of your household? How many years is it now last Christmas, or the 14th of next month? It was a dark night when he died, and a stormy day it was at the burial; and the clouds wept with you, and the winds sighed for the dead. The bell at Greenwood's gate rang only a few moments, but your heart has been tolling, tolling, ever since. You have been under a delusion, like Jacob of old. You have thought that Joseph was dead. You put his name first in the birth record of the family Bible, and then you put it in the death record of the family Bible, and you have been deceived. Joseph is yet alive. He is more alive than you are. Of all the 16,000,000,000 of children that statisticians say have gone into the future world, there is not one of them dead, and the King's wagons will take you up to see them. You often think how glad you will be to see them. Have you never thought, my brother, my sister, how glad they will be to see you? Jacob was no more glad to see Joseph than Joseph was to see Jacob. Every time the door in heaven opens, they look to see if it is you coming in. Joseph, once standing in the palace, burst out crying when he thought of Jacob—afar off. And the heaven of your little ones will not be fairly begun until you get there. All the kindnesses shown by immortals will not make them forget you. There they are, the radiant throngs that went out from your homes! I throw a kiss to the sweet darlings. They are all well now in the palace. The crippled child has a sound foot now. A little lame child says: "Ma, will I be lame in heaven?" "No, my darling, you won't be lame in heaven." A little blind child says: "Ma, will I be blind in heaven?" "No, my dear, you won't be blind in heaven." They are all well there.

In my boyhood, for some time we lived three miles from church, and on stormy days the children staid at home, but father and mother always went to church; that was a habit they had. On those stormy Sabbaths when we staid at home, the absence of our parents seemed very much protracted: for the roads were very bad, and they could not get on very fast. So we would go to the window at 12 o'clock to see if they were coming, and then we would go at half past 12 to see if they were coming, and at a quarter to one, and then at one o'clock. After a while, Mary, or David, or DeWitt would shout: "the wagon's coming!" and then we would see it winding out of the woods, and over the brook, and through the lane, and up in front of the old farm house; and then we would rush out, leaving the doors wide open, with many things to tell them, asking them many questions. Well, my dear brethren, I think we are many of us in the king's wagon's, and we are on the way home. The road is very bad, and we get on slowly; but after awhile we will come winding out of the woods, and though the brook of death, and up in front of the old heavenly homestead; and our departed kindred, who have been waiting and watching for us, will rush out through the doors and over the lawn, crying: "The wagons are coming! the King's wagon's are coming!" Hark! the bell of the city hall strikes 12. Twelve o'clock on earth, and likewise it is high noon in heaven.

Does not the subject of today take the gloom out of the thoughts that would otherwise be struck through with midnight? We used to think that when we died we would have to go afoot, sagging down in the mire, and the hounds of terror might get after us, and if we got through into heaven at all, we would come in torn and wounded and bleeding I remember when my teeth chattered and my knees knocked together when I heard anybody talk about death; but I have come to think that the grave will be the softest bed I ever slept in, and the bottom of my feet will not be wet with the passage of the Jordan. "Them that sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him."

I was reading of Robert Southey, who said he wished he could die far away from his friends—like a dog, crawling into a corner and dying unobserved. Those were his words. Be it ours to die on a couch surrounded by loved ones, so that they with us may hear the glad, sweet, jubilant announcement: "The King's wagons are coming." Hark! I hear them now. Are they coming for you or me?

DAKOTA JOTTINGS.

The La Grace Courier published four marriage notices last week and claims to have three more in sight.

The Rapid City Republican says: Members of the board of trade do not place much reliance on the reported intention of the Burlington and Missouri company to build their road to Custer, Hill City and other points in the tin districts. It is believed by them that the Wyoming coal fields are the objective point of the line from Alliance, and the new road will keep to the western base of the hills.

A man giving his name as Fritz Pauli come into Gary with a bay mare, which he sold for $30, and a gold watch. On inquiry at Watertown it was learned that the man was wanted for horse stealing. Sheriff Mellard arrested Pauli, and later developments show that a barn twelve miles from Watertown was set on fire, burning the contents, including five horses, the horse being taken from the barn.

A Boston gentleman, who is in the vigor of life and likely to outlive some of his children, has presented each of them with $1,000,000, the share of the estate they would get were he to die. There is some question whether such a sum of money will be an advantage to the average young person, but the possession of it will contribute to the cheerfulness in view of the possible longevity of the male parent.

The Midnight Candy Store.

The midnight candy store is a new thing in Upper Broadway. It is open for business all day long, of course, but the particular trade which it is opened to catch is that of the theatrical audiences. It is situated in a neighborhood of theaters, whose dispersing people are apt to see its glare of electric lights and its gorgeous front of illuminated red glass. The standard summer joke of the village newspaper, based on the difficulty experienced by the fellows in getting their girls past the ice cream saloon, is here adapted to the cold weather season in New York. A package of candy after the play is a sweet boon to women of every degree whether from the proscenium box or the topmost gallery, and the proprietor of this place doesn't mean that any couple shall walk past without paying attention to it. But the striking character of the exterior is exceeded inside, where a complement of very brightly red-haired girls are on duty from 10 o'clock at night until 1. Whatever differences of opinion may arise as to the beauty of their aggressive hair, their faces are all pleasant, and they form a curious exhibition. There is no naughtiness about it. They merely sell candy, smilingly but demurely, and their value lies in their attractiveness to their own sex, not to the other. The candy merchant calculates that they will make women talk about them and thus advertise his midnight wares, which consist of candies delivered directly from the caldrons during the time of dispersals of theater audiences.—Pittsburg Post's New York Letter.

Beautification of Joan of Arc.

The head of the Franciscan Order in France has memorialized the Pope in favor of the beautification of Joan of Arc. This will probably lead to a renewal of an old and embittered dispute among the French Catholics and the French radicals. The latter maintain that, as the Catholic priesthood helped to burn the Maid of Orleans, they have no right to appropriate her memory to the glories of their faith. This is the new party view of the question; the old one is recorded in Voltaire's scandalous page. The republic is now disposed to make a bold bid for the exclusive ownership of the maid as a patriotic heroine, and to compete with the priesthood for the right to celebrate her exploits. The contest has been all to the advantage of Joan of Arc, for both sides now unite to do her honor, where formerly she had to be content with the homage of one. Radical Paris has already given her a statue; and a religious committee at Rheims has issued an appeal for subscription to purchase another for the cathedral porch. The maid, no doubt, will reck but little, if they will let her sleep on.—London News.

The Power of Words.

The effect an advertisement has upon the reader is very well illustrated by the following, as related in the Mechanical News:

A wealthy man who owns a country residence became dissatisfied with it, and determined to have another. So he instructed a real estate agent famous for his descriptive powers to advertise it in the papers for private sale, but to conceal the location, telling purchasers to apply at his office. In a few days the gentleman happened to see the advertisement, was pleased with the account of the place, showed it to his wife, and the two concluded that it was just what they wanted, and they would secure it at once. So he went to the office of the agent and told him that the place he had advertised was such a one as he desired and he would purchase it. The agent burst into a laugh, and told him that was a description of his own house where he was then living. He read the advertisement again, cogitated over the "grassy slopes," "beautiful vistas," "smooth lawn," etc., and broke out, "Is it possible? Well, make out my bill for advertising and expenses, for, by George! I wouldn't sell the place now for three times what it cost me."

Good Deeds are Remembered.

How well people keep in mind the gifts they make to benevolent causes. They may forget all else, but this, never! In a certain church is a brother who never fails to tell those who apply to him for help of what he did towards building a certain church house, and yet he did it twenty-four years ago. He has forgotten much, but this one thing he never forgets, and with it he drives off every good cause that knocks at the door of his heart.—Richmond Religious Herald.

Mr. Dryrot: "Yes, two on 'em."

Tailor: "And two hip pockets, prohibition size."—Epoch.

A Good Reason.

"Boy," he said, as he made change for his paper, "why don't you wash your face? Nobody would recognize you with a clean face."

"That's the case in a nutshell," replied the boy. "I've got money lent out to ten different boys, and if I should wash my face they'd jump them debts quicker'n a streak of lightning." Detroit Free Press.

To be Sold Out.

"I am afraid," said a New York politician to a friend, "that Dave Hill will share the fate of Joseph."

"What Joseph?"

"The one who was sold out by his brethren."—Texas Siftings.

Near Edgbaston, England, is a pasture where a horse and a goat grazed. Some rude boys amused themselves by throwing stones at the goat and beating it, and were having a fine time when the horse cantered up, kicked, struck, and bit at the boys, and grabbing one young ruffian by the coat collar yanked him clean over the hedge.

Many years ago, among the household effects of a Scotch farmer who died in Canada, was an old portrait of Burns, which sold for little, and found its way to a pawn shop in Toronto: Some one bought it the other day for £2, had it carefully cleaned, and was rewarded by finding it to be an oil painting, by Raeburn, dated 1787. He values it at £2,000 and will send it to Scotland, where it will be exhibited.

It has been discovered that nearly every Colorado statesman has red hair. Ex. Gov. Grant has a Titian top. "Jim" Belford was a shining light in Congress, owing to his brilliant hair. Representative Symes, his successor, has a head which is said to look "like an angry sunset across a field of carrots." Ex-Senator Tabor's hair has a reddish tinge. Minor Colorado politicians show the same remarkable characteristic.

Mrs. Humphrey Ward is, it is reported, a brilliant woman socially as well as in "Robert Elsmere." She is very quiet in manner, but very distinguished; is not handsome, but leaves the impression that she is, and dresses much better than her British sisters generally; looks more like a French or American woman in dress, though her face is of marked London type—the flat cheeked, spiky nosed type.

The Lewiston Journal recently propounded the following questions: (1) Of what nature will be the next economic invention? (2) What great economic invention is most needed and called for by the world? (3) Does anything remain to be invented by man which shall be as revolutionary in its effects as the application of steam power? These were the answers received from General A. W. Greely: (1) The storage, without appreciable loss, of electricity produced by natural forces, such as waterfalls, tides, &c. (2) A cotton picker. (3) No.

THE NEWS RESUME.

The Cream of the News Gleaned From the Latest Associated Press Telegrams.

About Washington.

Action has been taken by Secretary Whitney which leaves no doubt as to the policy of of this government with regard to the case of the American steamer Haytian Republic, recently seized at Port au Prince, Hayti. The release of the vessel has been demanded through proper diplomatic channels, and if the demand is not complied with within a reasonable period of time steps will be taken to enforce it. With this end in view, Secretary Whitney sent telegraphic instructions to Rear Admiral Gerhardi, commandant of the New York navy yard, to have the ships Richmond, Galena and Yantic prepared for sea as rapidly as possible. The position taken by this government is understood to be that as the Haytian authorities deferred the ambitration of the case to this government, they are virtually bound by its decision, and that when they were informed by this government that they had no legal right to seize and detain the Haytian Republic they should have accepted the situation and released the vessel.

The Casualty Calendar.

The central state normal school building in Lock Haven, Pa., was totally destroyed by fire. One hundred boarding students, most of whom were in the building at the time, were safely removed. The building was of brick, four stories high and cost $150,000. The amount of the insurance is said to be small. The total number of students in attendance was over two hundred. Many of them lost their books, clothes and valuables.

An accident occurred on the Dudley branch of the Huntington & Broadtop railroad in Pennsylvania whereby more than a dozen persons were seriously injured. The more seriously injured are Mrs. Allen Black, John Dougherty, John Bollinger. Ed. F. Gould, Misses Lizzie and Mary Laster of Dudley, all of whom received dangerous internal injuries and painful cuts about their faces from the broken car windows.

Norman, the seven-year-old son of the late auditor, L. O. Storia, of Moorhead, Minn., has been missing. When last seen he was playing shinny on the ice on the Red river. It is believed he fell in one of the numerous open places in the ice and was drowned. One small boy who played with Norman said he saw him in the morning and that his clothes were wet and full of icicles. It is thought that the boy telling this story knows more about the lost boy but fears to tell, thinking he will be blamed. There is little hope that Noman Storia will ever be seen again alive.

Talk About People.

Madame De Forest, an aunt of Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, has suddenly disappeared. Her relatives and friends have vainly endeavored to locate her, but she does not reply to any of the letters sent to her, if, indeed, she receives them. It is feared she has entered a convent and destroyed her identity by assuming another name. She was ever a devout Catholic.

Mr. Phelps, the American minister, atteded the banquet of the Turners company in London. In replying to the toast of "Our Visitors," Mr. Phelps said that the great and everlasting ties that bound England and America depends upon the great heart of the two peoples. Treaties were of small consequence and diplomacy had seen its best days. It was upon the sentiment of the people that the harmony of the two countries most depended. Mr. Phelps was much applauded. Sir Charles Tupper also responded to the toast.

Petty Criminalities.

A robbery of $240,000 has been discovered in the government deposit bank at Madrid, Spain. The robbers are unknown, and the time of the robbery cannot as yet be definitely fixed.

A brace of foot pads slugged a man named J. E. Lind on the bridge over the Sioux river in Sioux Falls, Dak. One of the robbers struck him on the head with a slugshot while the other seized him by the throat, but he succeeded in shaking them off and crying for help, when the villians left without any booty.

An attempt was made in Brandon, Manitoba to circulate a petition asking for clemency for Webb, the wife murderer, under sentence to hang Dec. 20, but met with little success. The prisoner takes the matter coolly, and appears resigned to his fate.

The case of the state of Iowa, vs. Mrs. Julia Billings, growing out of sensational Kingsley-Billings murder case at Waverly last winter, has been transferred to the Waterloo (Blackhawk) district, in answer to an application for a change of venue on the ground of popular prejudice.

The striking miners at Bevier, Mo., are growing ugly and farther trouble is expected. A striker named Atkins asserts that they will build a stockade and defy the militia. There are only 45 of the state troops on the ground, and the threats of the strikers create considerable uneasiness.

In a cheap restaurant in Bermondsey street in London, a man made an unprovoked attack upon the landlord's daughter and cut her throat so seriously that she is not expected to recover. The affair has created great excitement in the neighborhood as the criminal is supposed to be "Jack the Ripper."

Frank Knoblock a prominent German and the treasurer of the International Brewing company, of Buffalo, N. Y., is found to be $8,250 short in his accounts. Knobloch's sureties will be called on for the amount of the shortage. The brewing company says it does not desire to prosecute Knoblock, and it is likely that the matter will be dropped.

About two weeks ago 20 of the leading business men of Coldwater, Kansas, went down into the Indian territory on a hunting expedition. Word has been received that the whole party has been captured near Camp Supply and are now awaiting transportation to Wichita, where they will be held to answer the charge of trespassing in the Indian territory.

A White Cap notice was left at Thomas Casey's saloon at Lima, Ohio notifying him that unless he vacated the building within twenty-four hours it would be burned to the ground. Casey did not heed the warning, and one night the building was burned. The White Caps left notices at several other saloons to take warning at Casey's treatment and leave the town.

Inspector Byrnes of New York, received a dispatch from Chili, stating that Gerald F. Hanson, alias William A. Bush, had been arrested in Santiago for embezzling money from the firm of Butler, Stillman & Hubbard, lawyers at 54 Wall street. The crime was committed ten years ago, and the amount stolen is said to be $35,000. Requisition papers will be forwarded to Chili and the prisoner brought to New York.

John Martin, an engineer of Chicago married, fell desperately in love with Mrs. W. S. Merrill, his landlady, and knowing that his love was unrequitted, shot her and then killed himself. B. W. Merrill and his wife have kept the boarding house for several years. Among their boarders was Martin, and ever since his arrival in the house, over a year ago, he has professed the greatest love for Mrs. Merrill. His importunities at last became unbearable, and so she advised him to leave. After pleading with her not to send him away, and finding her determined he shot her and then himself. Mrs. Merrill died in the afternoon.

David L. Fotheringham, the Adams Express messenger, who was robbed of $35,000 by Frederick Witrock, in October, 1885, and who was arrested for complicity in the affair, settled with the express company at St. Louis for $8,800. After the robbery Fotheringham was held a prisoner at the Southern hotel for three weeks, and subsequently indicted and placed in jail. The trial of Witrock established the messenger's innocence. He sued for $60,000 and received a judgement for $20,000. This was cut down by the court to $12,000. The express company showed an inclination to fight farther, but finally compromised on $8,800, which was paid to Fotheringham.

In the trial of John H. Bauereisen, chief of the alleged Burlington dynamite conspirators, the jury panel was completed at Geneva, Ill. John Alexander Bowles, who it is said, was a conspirator and one of the squealers, was put on the witness stand as the first and most important witness. Bowles testified that he went to work as an engineer for the Burlington March 22, 1888, and was persuaded to quit by his brother April 4. He joined the Brotherhood and was employed by Bauereisen to buy dynamite and place it on the tracks, and also to buy vitriol and ammonia to put in water tanks and dose engines.

"I have been sleeping with a corpse for three days without knowing it," said a tramp to William Steels a milkman, living on the Scotch Plains road near Plainfield, N. J. A hay barrack, owned by Steele, had been the tramp's bed for several nights, and every time he lay down or got up he noticed that a strange bedfellow lay by his side seemingly sound asleep. Then he found that the stranger was dead, and that he had evidently been so all the time. County Physician Westcott was notified. Underaker Patrick Casey removed the corpse to the morgue in Plainfield. On the body was a paper bearing the name "Wm. Taylor." A sailor's jacket, marked "Dauntless" was one of the dead man's garments. The man's arm and hands were tatoed. The tramp is under arrest.

It seems that the disturbances at Bevier, Mo., where the serious riot occurred on the night of the 5th, are by no means settled. It is said that when any of the strikers at Bevier go elsewhere to work they are refused work if it is known that they come from Bevier and belong to the labor confederation there. As long as the strike is continued at Bevier these strikers receive support from the state state refuses to interfere armed men will go to Bevier, and the people will soon have more men killed there than they will be willing to buy coffins for. The disarming of both sides at Bevier seems to be a hard thing to do. Gen. Jamison says the only way it can be done is for the governor to declare the town under martial law. A later dispatch says Gov. Moorhouse has ordered out the militia.

Harry Nowak, a peddler, aged 25 years, was stabbed and killed at New York by Giovani Genoa, a workman in a shoe store which Nowak had entered, and who had gotten into a quarrel with the peddler. He became enraged because Nowak spoke to the 12-year-old daughter of Genoa's employer, and chuckled her under the chin saying, "You are a pretty child." Genoa seized a hammer and attacked Norwak. Then, throwing the hammer away he caught up a shoemaker's knife and stabbed Nowak three times, twice in the neck, severing the jugular vein, and once in the heart. Nowak ran out of the door and fell dead. The police are hunting for Genoa.

P. B. Long of Georgetown, Ohio, has received a White Cap warning, addressed to the citizens of Georgetown. As usual, it is written in red ink, with a picture of whips drawn at the top of the letter. The warning reads as follows: To the Citizens of Georgetown: We want to say now, that if they don't quit making threats of what they will do if we come to your town we want to say now, we will burn every house in the place. The exhibition of the night of the 3d (court house fire) is not to be thought of in connection with what we will do, for we must succeed at any cost. So take warnings and you will have less use for your engines. The letter is dated at Mount Orob, which is believed to be the center of the White Caps organization, its signature is similar to that of the other letters received.

Gov. Seay, in an interview with the people of Birmingham, Ala., approved the conduct of the Sheriff who suppressed a lynching party with blood. The governor afterwards had an interview with Sheriff Smith, and said that he endorsed the sheriff and was glad that Jefferson county had a high sheriff, who, no matter how painful his duty, could uphold the law and protect the county jail. Sheriff Smith was released on $25,000 bail, and will take charge of his office again at once. No sooner had this fact been circulated on the street than it created a profound sensation. People gathered about the streets and gave vehement expression to their indignation. It was thought unjust that the murderer of so many citizens should go free on bond while Hawes, who had murdered only three members of his family, should still be confined. It was openly asserted that more violence would surely follow this action and predictions were made on all sides that Smith would not be alive at midnight.

For a number of months past the night trains on the Illinois Central have been fired on from a point near Storm Lake, Iowa, and one night Brakeman Ed. Wright was shot, narrowly escaping a fatal wound, this frightened the culprits, who, betraying themselves by their actions, were arrested by Special Detective Smith. The offenders were two boys, Charles Blake, aged nineteen, and George Smith, aged fourteen. They immediately confessed their guilt, but each charges that the other fired the shot that struck Wright. Since the arrest they have taken the matter calmly, and give no reason but a desire for "fun." Blake's home is at Storm Lake and he belongs to a respectable and well-to-do family. Smith lives in Sioux Falls, Dak., and has been visiting Blake. The railway company has an intention of making an example of the boys and demand the greatest punishment allowed by law.

Foreign Gleanings

The hope that the man arrested in Kentucky would prove to be the much sought Tascott, the supposed murderer of the late A. J. Snell of Chicago, has been dashed by the receipt of a telegram from Lyons saying that the suspected prisoner has been released.

The German reichstag adjourns on Dec. 15 and will reassemble about the middle of January. The Critical situation in East Africa, where the Arabs are effectually wiping out the German colonists and clearing the territory of every vestige of the German regime, will force more ample explanations of Germany's policy than the chancellor intended. Count Herbert Bismarck, since his return from Friedrichsruhe, has maintained a reserve regarding the plans of his father, giving evasive replies to the "feelers" privately put to him by friends in the reichstag. It is reported that the chancellor may yet relieve Count Herbert of the responsibility of making explanations and come himself to the reichstag to disclose his scheme for the restoration of German influence.

Other News Jottings.

A meteoric stone, weighing about 140 pounds, has been found near Ellsworth, Wis., twelve miles from Red Wing, Minn. It has evidently fallen very recently, as the ground under it was covered with fresh leaves. It is of a whitish appearance, somewhat resembling alum.

Judge Rucker is reported as having said: This matter between Blackburn and myself is at an end, for I have received letters from all over the country, and, after giving them my earnest consideration, I have come to the conclusion that Blackburn's last letter was really an apology, which puts an end to the affair.

Roger C. Spooner of Madison has been designated by the governor of Wisconsin; Hon. Charles Beardsley of Burlington by the governor of Iowa, and Capt. W. M. Braden of St. Paul by the governor of Minnesota to represent these states on the committee on civic organizations in the inauguration ceremonies at Washington on the 4th of March.

The Wisconsin State Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, met in annual session at Madison. In his annual address Master S. C. Carr declared that to close our gates, both East and West, to immigration of the lowest classes of foreigners, and to rely upon the natural increase of our own people, is to secure to them a just and equal share of our land resources; to pursue a different policy is to rob them of their natural inheritance.

Advices from the Indian Territory says that the interior department has notified the Cherokees, that the Cherokee Strip is the property of the United States, and that the Indians have no right to lease it. The strip contains 6,000,000 acres of grazing land. Recently the Cherokee legislature, sitting at Tanlequan, passed a bill leasing the strip to a stock syndicate at $200,000 yearly for five years.

Dr. Nathan R. Gorter docketed suit in the superior court of Baltimore against Robert Garrett, claiming $30,000. The suit is stated to be based on a claim for $25,000 for professional services during his trip around the world. Dr. Gorter was with Mr. Garrett for eight months, and his bill, before being presented for payment, was submitted to two eminent physicians of who agreed that it was a proper charge. The bill was refused payment, hence the suit.

A foot ball game at the naval academy at Annapolis between the naval students and the St. John's college team was played with much excitement but at its close a very unusual scene occurred. About thirty college boys, ranging in age from twelve to twenty, grouped together and showed their delight at the second defeat that their club had given the cadets this season. The cadets were angered by the same result, and, maddened by the college cries and taunts of opponents, about one hundred of the former formed in a solid phalanx and marched down and attacked the college boys and a regular battle ensued.

State Dairymen's Association.

At the annual meeting of the State Dairymen's Association at Faribault, Minn., Mr. John F. Ames, of Northfield, said: He believed the dairy cow was the salvation of many Minnesota farms. Care should be exercised in the feed of the cow. She should also be treated considerately. No dog had yet been invented suitable to drive dairy cows. The cow's feed in winter should consist of good hay, sheaf oats, some ensilage perhaps, and plenty of warm water. She should not be kept in a place where water will freeze. It is a good scheme to have a well in or near the barn where the water can be pumped and distributed to the cows without turning them out. It doesn't pay to kick a cow or strike her with the milking stool. It causes a decrease in the quantity of milk. He would not classify a cow as a good cow, which would not net her owner $60 a year.

"Do you notice any peculiar odor about the milk when you are feeding ensilage?" asked Dairy Commissioner Ives.

"No, none whatever," said Mr. Ames.

A long series of questions followed on the proper feed for the cow, and then Mr. C. Le Vesconte, of Hastings, an importer and breeder of Jersey cattle, gave a talk on "Ropy Milk." The speaker simply related his experience, without suggesting any remedy, for he said he had seen in none of the books or papers an explanation of the trouble.

J. H. Monrad, of Chicago then read a paper on the "Daries of America as Compared with Those of Europe." Mr. Monrad is a German and a jolly good fellow, who is the life of the party when the convention is not in session. He thought that the best creamery men in Europe might learn to hustle a little from Americans, while Americans might learn from foreigners attention to details. Cheese is more of a feature in dairy work in Europe, and a demand is made for it by making a large variety of the goods to suit all tastes. He would not speak against the factories, but he thought the best results could be attained in private factories. Co-operative creameries in Denmark are worked quite successfully. He advised that the buttermaker in large dairies be given a share of the profits —let him have an interest in the business. He then read an extract from his diary written in Holland, in which he described a creamery in Holland, which was a combination of stable and dairy, so clean that the cheese were being cured in the same room where the cows were being kept.

The paper was one of the most entertaining of the session. It was followed by a talk by A. Van Hammert on dehorning cattle.

THE RESOLUTIONS.

Chairman Lampman, of the resolution committee, read the following report, which was adopted by sections:

We reassert all the main planks in the platform heretofore adopted by the territorial alliance. Believing that the entire financial system of our nation is controlled in the interests of capitalists, we therefore emphatically condemn the organization of trusts and combinations for unnaturally raising prices of manufactured articles, reducing values of farm products, monopolizing transportation and improperly controlling our God-given fuel supply; second, again recognizing the direful effect of usury as practiced, we ask for the passage of strict usury laws.

Resolved, That we ask the council and house of representatives to pass a bill making it unlawful and a penal offense to manufacture, import or sell intoxicating liquor in the Territory of Dakota, believing that such a law would be of incalcuable benefit and to the interest and happiness of all the people of Dakota. Third—Believing the people of North and South Dakota will be soon called upon to take action in framing and adopting constitutions for their respective states, we deem it of great importance that the people, especially the farmers of Dakota, be fully alive to the importance of standing ready and united to see that the framing of those constitutions be entrusted to tried and true men who will engraft into said constitutions the right of the people to control all corporations which may use or are using the right of eminent domain.

Whereas, we have noticed with alarming solicitude that under the present system a voting corruption and fraud is possible, and very often practiced to the detriment of the peoples right. We do most emphatically urge the engrafting into the constitution the imperative provision adopting principles known as the Australian system of voting; we also favor the control, ownership and working of mineral lands by the government; we respectfully recommend that the convention put itself on record as opposed to the government selling any more coal land, and in lieu thereof to lease such in limited quanties to parties desiring to work the same on conditions prescribed by the government for the equal privileges of all. We deem it for the best interests of the people of the Northwest.

Resolved, That North Dakota be admitted to the Union as soon as practicable under the constitution to be framed by her people, and that the dividing line be the seventh standard parallel.

Resolved, That we extend the right hand of fellowship to the Knights of Labor in the territory and invite their co-operation in relieving the farmer and laborer from the burdens and oppressions under which they now suffer.

Resolved, That all officers of the territory appointed by the president should receive no compensation, direct or indirect, than that provided by the general government.

Resolved, That we believe the alliance work has been directed under the present management in an able and satisfactory manner, and that we heartily endorse this action.

The following additional resolutions, upon which the committee was divided, were reported without recommendation:

First, that exemption laws should be modified and limited; second, that a law be enacted making notes and contracts void when obtained through fraud though in the hands of innocent parties; third, that the executive committee be requested to take steps to insure the dissemination among the people of Dakota of information concerning the work of the legislature; fourth, the members of this committee from South Dakota, believing that there are not sufficient safeguards in the Sioux Falls constitution to fully protect us against corporate greed, we favor the framing of a new constitution.

The second and third resolutions were adopted and the fourth laid on the table. After discussion I. S. Lampman introduced a resolution requesting the legislature to devise some means to assist destitute farmers who had no crop this year to secure seed wheat for next spring; carried. For the place of the next annual meeting Aberdeen, Redfield, Watertown and Huron were placed in nomination Aberdeen was chosen.

Proposed Union with Canada.

Representative Butterworth of Ohio is very enthusiastic for commercial union between this country and Canada. He has devoted much thought to this subject, and has formed a definite plan by which he thinks that this union can be accomplished. This plan he has embodied in the following joint resolutions which he introduced in the house at Washington.

Whereas, The citizens of the dominion of Canada are one with us in race, lineage, history and tradition; and, whereas, the resources of the two countries supplement each other, and the arteries of commerce, both natural and artificial, are so interlocked and mutually dependent upon each other that they ought to constitute a single system, to be one and inseparable; and whereas, the commercial relations between the United States and the dominion of Canada are, and have been, strained and unnaturally cramped and in a measure paralyzed, owing to the inability of the two governments to establish such a system of international trade and commerce between them as is essential to meet the requirements of the situation; and whereas, the conditions and relations before referred to, as also the geography of the two countries, suggest the impossibility of a just and permanent settlement of the controversies pertaining to the fisheries, bounderies and transcontinental trades, except by blending of efforts, and interests, under one governmental system, and point logically to the necessity and probability of a unity and assimilation between the two nations under one government; and whereas, the bonds of sympathy resulting from kinship, race, language, tradition and substantial identity of governmental systems, together with a community of interests, based upon commerce and its aids and agencies, are of such a character that such union and assimilation is being discussed and favorably considered by the citizens of both nations, and, inasmuch as it is believed that its early consummation would be of great advantage to all citizens and subjects of the two countries, provided the same can be attained in a manner consistent alike with the honor and dignity of the United States and Great Britain and the Dominion of Canada. Therefore, with a view to aid in the consummation of what is herein before suggested, be it.

Resolved, That the president be and is hereby authorized and empowered to invite negotiations looking to the assimilation and unity of the people of the Dominion of Canada and the United States under one government, such unity and assimilation to be based upon the admission of the several provinces of the dominion or any one of them into the union of states upon the same terms and equality with the states now composing the union, and the assumption by the United States of the indebtedness of the Dominion of Canada, or a just proposition thereof, and such other equitable terms and conditions as justice to the high contracting parties may demand.

Resolved, That, with a view to such negotiation, the president invite the appointment of commissioners by the government of Great Britain and the Dominion of Canada to consider the wisdom and expediency of settling all controversies and difference which now exist between the two governments, growing out of the fisheries or otherwise, by such a union and assimilation as is hereinbefore suggested, either as to the whole or any province of several provinces of said dominion, such negotiations to be conducted with due regard to the amicable relations which obtain between Great Britain and the United States and the obligations imposed thereby.

Outrages of Ohio White Caps.

Fresh outrages on the part of masked men in the vicinity of Toledo show that the White Caps are organized and working to a purpose. A man named Martin, living a few miles from Bowling Green, Wood county, received notice early in the week that if he did not go to work and support his family he would meet punishment at the hands of "Wood county vigilantes." Martin paid no attention to the notice, and one evening, as he started for home in an intoxicated condition, he was seized by a band of masked men and taken into the woods. A rope was tied around his neck and one end thrown over a limb. He began to pray. Twice the men cut the prayer short by drawing their victim up until he dangled in the air. Then they stripped him, tied him to a tree and applied beech switches until his back was a mass of bleeding flash. His clothes were then replaced and he was taken home, where he now lies sick. A few nights ago a man named Miller, living at Liepsic, received a notice similar to the one sent Martin. He paid no attention to it, thinking it was a practical joke by some of his neighbors but learned of his mistake too late. He was visited early in the week by White Caps, taken from the house and unmercifully lashed. At Fostoria, notices were posted a week ago, and when they were torn down by those to whom they were directed, others were sent. General notices, addressed "To Whom It May Concern," were tacked on the trees in front of ex-Gov. Foster's residences, and the yards of other prominent citizens. For ten days the things were regarded as a great hoax, and every one ridiculed the idea of White Caps visiting Fostoria. Recently a band of men mounted and equipped in White Cap outfit dashed through the town. An attempt was made to follow them, but they scattered and were soon lost in a dense forest a few miles from the town. While there is no danger of the regulators doing any of their work within the city limit they have already sent notices to farmers living in adjacent townships. Defiance, Napoleon, Perryburg and Maumee have each been visited, although no actual outrage was attempted. The skull and cross bones, with the representation of a bowie knife beneath, is a favorite sign of the order in this vicinity. At Napoleon a notice bore the words, "God hates liars and perjurers and adulterers. The White Cappers are the Lord's chosen people to wreak out his vengeance on the wicked and unjust." The people are becoming much alarmed.

Railroad Accident.

An accommodation train on the Milwaukee & St. Paul road collided with a freight train about a mile above Reed's Landing, resulting in the loss of one life and injury to several more. The supposition is that the conductor and engineer of the south-bound had forgotten the recent change of time and were endeavoring to reach Wabasha before the old leaving time of the accommodation, for the freight was running at full speed when it came in sight of the former, just above Reed's Landing at a sharp curve. It was then to late to even check the force of the collision that followed, and the trains came together with a terrific crash. The firemen of both trains jumped on first seeing the danger, and the engineers followed suit just before their engines struck. Sumner Brooks, the head brakeman, was instantly killed, his body being found four or five hours later under the tender of the freight engine. Conductor Mede, of the accommodation, received a severe spinal injury in jumping, and the internal injury may prove fatal. Harry McKay, the paggageman, and Conductor Nelson, of the freight, were slightly hurt, as were also the brakeman. The injured men were taken to Wabasha for medical treatment. The wreck was a bad one. Both engines were thrown from the track and rolled down the high embankment. The passenger coaches were also derailed, the combination cars somewhat smashed. Eight loaded cars were completey wrecked and their contents scattered promiscously about. A special from Wabasha went up to the scene at once and brought the passengers back. The remains of Brooks, the dead brakeman, were first taken to Wabasha and later in the day to Minneapolis, where his mother and brother live. Brooks had been what is known as an extra brakeman for the past two years, and only lately he was promoted to a steady run. He was twenty-one years of age. Young Brooks' father did the past year in the asylum at Rochester.

MINNESOTA IN BRIEF.

The W. R. C. of Adrian has donated $50 for the soldiers' home at Minnehaha.

The pay rolls of the city of Duluth for the month of November amounted to $20.236.

The city council and the Fergus Falls gas company are wrestling over the gas contract.

The infant child of Chas H. Essler, of St. Peter, swallowed a dose of Rough on Rats and died from its effects.

A telegraph line has just been completed along the Milwaukee Cannon Valley road between Red Wing and Northfield.

Dennis Shean, a well known farmer living near Waseca, was the victim of a runaway accident by which he lost his life.

Mrs. A. Link, aged 70 years, residing near Preston, was knocked down and trampled on by a colt. Her recovery is doubtful.

Rhodes Bros., retail grocers at Winona, have made an assignment. Their assets are about $1,500 and liabilities $3,000.

Roy Hellweg and Frank Middaugh, aged ten and eight years, respectively, were drowned while skating on the river near Owatonna.

Fred Wright and Fred Freeman, two young toughs at Owatonna, have been sentenced to two years in the reform school for burglary.

So far this year 685 prisoners have been confined in the county jail at Duluth, of whom 518 have been city, 151 county and 16 United States prisoners.

The Philharmonic society of Winona has decided to revive the old custom of having a big carnival and street parade. It will occur some time during the winter.

Miss Emma Barnholtz, daughter of a wealthy Winona county farmer, and Albert Glaser, her cousin, eloped because Miss Barnholtz's parents opposed their marriage.

At the last regular buisness meeting of the Duluth Turn verein a motion was made and carried unanimously amid great enthusiasm prohibiting the members from treating or accepting treats at the bar.

Two barns, one of which belonged to V. C. Clifford and the other to H. D. Wickham, in Lake City, were destroyed by a fire of unknown origin which was first discovered in a straw shed between the two buildings. The residence of Mr. Clifford was scorched.

Willie Mitchell, son of Judge Mitchell, and Carrie Curtis, daughter of Prof. V. G. Curtis, broke through the ice while skating on Lake Winona and narrowly escaped drowning. Young Mitchell succeeded in getting out without assistance. Miss Curtis was rescued by some young men skating in the vicinity.

Bert Wilbur was jailed at Mankato. He escaped from the Waupun (Wis.) penitentiary last August, where he was serving a term for horse stealing. He came to visit a cousin at Vernon Center, and was apprehended by the officers on infomation from Waupon. His friends say he is not in his right mind.

Burglars entered Lufkin & Kendall's hardware store at St. Cloud through a rear window and stole several dozen knives, a dozen revolvers and silver knives and forks of a total value of almost $50. They were probably frightened away, as they did not touch a number of the most valuable things in the show cases.

True bills have been found against John Gibbs for robbing the depot at Madison Lake, Ed. Greenbush for highway robbery, and against two boys, named Childs and Laffey, of Beauford for lecherous conduct at school. These four will be arranged at Mankato. Gibbs says he will plead guilty and Greenbush will plead not guilty.

The grand jury at Buffalo found two important indictments, one against Erickson of Annandale for killing a man named Johnson in a saloon at Cokato. Robert Porter, an old settler of Woodland, in Wright county, was indicted on a charge of attempting to poison a neighbor's well by dropping a bottle of Paris green into it. The case has occasioned great interest and developments are eagerly awaited.

A little fellow named Johnny Burley was brought before Judge Allen at the municipal court in Winona by his grandmother, who asked that he be sent to the reform school. Johnny's mother is dead, his father intemperate, and his grandmother claims she cannot make a good boy out of him. The public schools closed their doors against the incorrigible pupil, and the boy's penchant for stealing made him too troublesome and dangerous for the good of the neighborhood. The request was complied with.

They Can't Come Down.

The latest fancy in stockings is not stockings at all, but an elegant little arrangement, silken and sheeny, tinted in faintest suggestions of color, is drawn up on soft dainty ribbons, fits as close as a kiss, and costs $20. When a sweet girl slips into a stocking of this kind she is all dressed, and she banishes one of the worries that help to make girls grow old before their time—they can't come down. There are no treacherous buckles to unclasp at a critical time, no unscrupulous catches to give out with malice prepense just as she descends from a car or is mounting the stairs to a theater, and can't fix them, no false-hearted buttons to lose their moorings in the midst of a waltz or polka. No, the fair lady ties the tiny ribbon at the top of her stockings around her shoulders and her mind is at rest.—Oakland (Cal.) Echoes.

CLOVER LORE

The Charming Fancies that Have Sprung from the Trefoil.

It is generally known that the three-leaved clover is an emblem of the Trinity, the legend being that St. Patrick first used it to illustrate how three separate objects, such as its leaves, could yet form one. But according to J. B. Friedreich, it was a very ancient Germans as setting forth the three grades of Druids, Bards and Neophytes. And as one legend or myth or superstition begets many, so there grew from this a number, which, however, all refer to the clover with four leaves, the rarity of which gave rise to the belief that it would bring good luck to the one who carried it.

When sitting in the grass we see
A little four-leaved clover,
'Tis luck for thee and luck for me,
Or luck for any lover.

It is believed in the Tyrol that if any one has "a turn" for magic he can acquire the art of working wonders easily enough if he only searches for and finds the four-leaved clover on St. John's Eve. In the Passierthal the peasants believe that if a traveller should at this time fall asleep, lying on his back, by a certain brook, there will come flying a white dove bearing a four-leaved clover, which it lets fall on the sleeper's breast. Should he awake before it fades, and at once put it into his mouth, he will require the power of becoming invisible at will.

A stranger superstition in Wolf's "Zeitschrift fur Deutsche Mythologie" is to the effect that if, while a priest is reading the service, any one can, unknown to him, lay a four-leaved clover on his mass book, the unfortunate clergyman will not be able to utter a word. He will stand stock still and bewildered until the person who has played the trick pulls his robe. Then he can proceed. When all is over the man who regains his "four-leaf" will always have luck at all kinds of gambling. If he has a tendency to tenpins in America, or to ninepins if it be in Germany, he makes a "ten strike," or alle neune, every time he rolls a ball.

It would seem by this that though the trifolium is a religious symbol, the four-leaf smacks of a darker influence. If the bearer or wearer of a four-leaved clover should come across witch work or any uncanny performance he can detect and spoil it all unharmed.

If a man loves a woman (or vice versa) and can obtain two four-leaved clovers and induce her to eat one while he himself swallows the other, mutual love is sure to result. Nay, according to very good gypsy authority, even a trin-patrini-kas, or three-leaved clover, will have this effect. Moreover, it is advisable on all occasions when you make a gift to anybody, no matter what it is, to conceal in it a clover, since it will render the gift doubly acceptable.

Also take a four or three-leaved clover, and, making a hollow in the end or top of your alpenstock or cane, put the leaf therein, taking care not to injure it, and close the opening carefully. Then so long as you walk with it you will be less weary than if it were wanting and will enjoy luck in many ways.

A German proverb says of a lucky man, "Er hat ein vierblattriges Kleeblatt gefunden"—"He has found a four-leaved clover." On this test Dr. Wilhelm Korte, in his "Spritchworter der Deutschen," preaches the following homily: "This is, you say, 'a stupid superstition.' Did you ever know a man who was ganz und gar, utterly and entirely, devoid of superstition? For if you did, be sure there was nothing in him."—St. James's Gazette.

"Mr. Scrapem," said the hostess to an amateur violinist at an evening gathering, "you play the violin, do you not?"

"Yes—after a fashion, you know," was the modest reply.

"No, I did not."

"How nice!" murmured the other half of the company, in fervent unison. —Merchant Traveler.

She Did the Best She Knew.

Mr. Bullion—"What induced you, Maria, to tell Lord Bromleigh that our peachblow vase cost 'ten stone'? What do you mean by ten stone?"

Mrs. Bullion—"There you go. Always finding fault with me. You told me to drop my Americanisms when Lord Bromleigh dined here, and I did. You also told me that a stone was equal to fourteen pounds, and I am sure the vase cost £140." And then Mrs. Bullion burst into tears over the unreasonableness of mankind in general, and Mr. Bullion in particular."—Harper's Bazar.

The Senatorship.

The contest for U. S. Senator seems to have narrowed down to Gen. Washburn and the Hon. D. M. Sabin, with the chances for the success of a dark horse growing less every day. Both are giants mentally and politically, and it is becoming a very interesting question which will win. Our representatives have a very important duty to discharge and it is their duty to their constituents to discharge that duty as nearly in accordance the wishes and the best welfare of their constituents as possible. W. D. Washburn is one of the most prominent business men of our state, who has built up a collossal fortune, and who is now president of a large railroad. D. M. Sabin is also well known as one of the most prominent manufacturers in our state, a man who has done as much for the state in this way as any other man in it if not more; a man who has invested several fortunes in manufacturing concerns in our state but who is comparatively a poor man. He was for some years an influential member of our legislature, for the past six years he has represented the state in the U. S. senate. Whenever there is any business of special importance to be attended to it is customary to say: "Send it to Sabin; he will fix it up all right." He has become one of the most influential members in that august body, composed of the most brilliant minds of the country, and he seldom has any difficulty in getting through measures where many would fail. Mr. Sabin, in his first term in the senate has done much for the up-building of this state and the Northwest especially owes him a great deal for what he has accomplished for her interests. Like Mr. Sabin, Mr. Washburn has been prominent in the up-building of manufactures, which, while they enriched their owner proved beneficial to the interests of the state. Mr. Washburn has also built an important railrod and had there been no watered stock in the concern, whereby farmers have to pay more than a just and due profit he would have been a true public benefactor, rare, (perhaps) to be found. Here was an opportunity to have made a sufficient fortune and at the same time a reputation as a public benefactor, as rare as it would be priceless. The questions that our farmers are continually asking themselves are these: "Is the man who has built a railroad, watered its stock to the extent of a million or so personal profit, the best man to send to the senate to make laws against watering stock?" "How far would this man's private railroad interests influence his judgment in any case wherein the railroad's power to make excessive profits should be questioned?" "Would it not be natural for a senate composed of railroad men to pass laws favorable to the money making schemes, or so constructed as to allow the same results to be attained, as before, under color of the law?" "Would not our interests be safer in the hands of a man in no wise interested in watered stocks?" What's the matter with Sabin?"

The last issue of the Warren Sheaf closes its eighth volume. The Sheaf, under the managment of H. E. Mussey has became a live local paper one that amply deserves the hearty patronage of its constituents and gets it, judging by its appearance. Success to the Sheaf. Long may she wave.

The Moorhead News earnestly advocates the re-appointment of Hon. John L. Gibbs on the board of railroad and warehouse commissioners, but does not want that appointment to interfere with anyone from the Fifth district. That would not necessarily follow as Mr. Gibbs is not a resident of the Fifth.

Duluth Herald: Senator Sabin is closer to President Harrison than any other Minnesota man, and as senator from this state would have more influence with the administration than any of his competitors could possibly have. If the legislature of this state wish to elect a man to the United States senate who can do the most in the way of securing beneficial local legislation they will choose D. M. Sabin.

Motley Register: We are not among those who believe that the state would suffer disgrace if W. D. Washburn were elected senator. He would represent us well. Nor do we join in the cry that he is using money in an unjust manner to further his election. We leave that charge to our democratic friends. But we do have an honest preference for D. M. Sabin, and see no reason why it should not be avowed.

Marshall County Leader: Gov. elect Merriam is constantly beseiged by office seekers and he will find it hard work to make really good selections in every case, owing to the pressure from the political workers who think they are entitled to their reward. There is one office which many republicans up this way would like to see filled by a man whose claims are higher even than loyal party service. We refer to the office of Chief Weighmaster at Duluth. Mr. A. N. Hopkins has faithfully discharged the duties of assistant weighmaster for some time and his promotion would be in the line of true reform in our civil service. He is an old soldier, a faithful man in every sense and a true blue republican every time. A petition for his appointment is being circulated and the Leader voices the wish of all our people when it says that it hopes the governor may appoint him.

Watered Stock.

A Thousand Dollars a Day.

Western Rural.

In conversation with a gentleman who is connected with a small railroad that runs into Chicago, a few days ago, he said that it required a thousand dollars a day to pay profits on that portion of the road's debt which is represented by its watered stock. This is a small item in railroad expeditures, but the road is not an important one, and we thought that it would be a good item to use to bring this evil within the ordinary conception. It is not always best to use large figures. When we talk of millions we get so far beyond the mind's conception that we often fail to comprehend a matter as well as we would if we could illustrate it by thousands. The road referred to is taking a thousand dollars a day out of the people's pockets to pay interest upon money which has gone into the pockets of some of the managers and manipulators of the road and its stock. The transaction is as if A should borrow ten thousand dollars of B, and compel C to pay interest on the money. It is a very pretty way for A, and B is all right, too, but it is hard on C. That is a perfect illustration of the working of this watered stock fraud. Somebody has got the money that this road is charging the public a thousand dollars a day to pay interest upon. Whoever that somebody else is, he never gave a penny of consideration for the money and has never paid a penny of interest for its use. The lender, as we may call him, must have his interest, however. He must receive his dividends upon this bogus stock or he will kick and the road must go into bankruptcy. Somebody, therefore must pay the interest; and that somebody may be the readers of this article. Certainly if they are not paying this thousand dollars a day they are paying a similar assessment upon other roads.

Now it is foolish to think that our people will submit to such an injustice forever. They have submitted to it only because the extortion was commenced, and grew into a confirmed railroad method, before they realized it, and when a system is once confirmed, it is hard to break it. But the people have been moving upon the illegitimat practices of the railroad corporations and have done considerable toward remedying them. The railroad, as a whole, does not fly as high as it did a dozen years ago. But this watered stock feature has not yet been touched. We have not got as far as that, but the time is come to take it up and agitate it with an emphatic determination to lift the burden which it imposes off our houlders. It must be made an issue in our politics. If there is any other way to get rid of it, except by the Rural's plan to allow a road to earn a reasenable profit upon the actual present worth of the road, let us have it. The Rural is not particular as to the plan, but it insists that the watered stock evil shall be got rid of.

A Splendid 8-Page, 56-Column Paper,

Printed on fine paper, edited with signal ability and filled with the most interesting matter that can be procured.

ONLY $1 A YEAR—TWO CENTS A WEEK.

The National Tribune is the result of years of earnest, thoughtful effort, accompanied by a heavy expenditure of money, to build up at the Capital of the country which should be a welcome weekly visitor at every fireside from the Atlantic to the Pacific and champion effectively the cause of loyalty and good government, and of justice to the soldiers and sailors of the late war, their widows, children and dependent relatives. How well this has been done is best indicated by the wonderful success of the paper, which has attained popularity and circulation more rapidly than any other in the history of American journalism.

A GREAT FAMILY NEWSPAPER

Features of the Paper.

The National Tribune makes a special feature of the history and reminiscences of the war for the preservation of the Nation. It publishes in fact the

of that gigantic struggle, for its history is not a warped and biased panegyric of some particular man or men, who are given credit for everything that succeeded. It is made up of the testimony of a multitude of witnesses, the plain, unvarnished stories of the men in every rank and degree who did the marching, digging and shooting and carried forward the war through all its various phases to a glorious success. The great value of the National Tribune's history is everywhere recognized, and its files are carefully preserved in every large library and historical collection in the country—North or South.

A fascinating story by Col. Thos. Knox, the brilliant writer of popular books, is now running in the paper.

An entertaining historical romance, by Frances Wilson (Fannie Williams), now appearing, is exciting great interest among the young folks with whom Miss Wilson has always been a great favorite.

Back numbers containing these will be furnished.

Very many distinguished men and women constantly contribute to its columns. It is favored in this way more than any other great weekly in the country.

John McElroy, who has written so much and so acceptably for the soldiers, will soon begin another war story.

Besides this it presents every week a splendid array of Editorials on Current Topics Stories by the Best Authors—Wit, Humor and Information—Agricultural Notes of the Greatest Value—Household Hints and Suggestions—Synopsis of the News of the Week—Answers to Correspondents—Bright Miscellany, etc., which will interest, amuse and instruct every member of the family.

The Duluth & Winnipeg.

The Directors Meet in This City and Elects Officers for the Ensuing Year.

Duluth Tribune, Dec. 14.

Messrs. W. H. Fisher and E. D. Childs, of Crookston, met yesterday with the Duluth contingent of the Duluth & Winnipeg road shareholders and proceeded to elect the following officers: President, Ammi W. Wright, of Alma, Mich.; vice president and general manager, W. H. Fisher, of St. Paul; secretary and treasurer, C. W. Wells, of Saginaw, Mich.; executive committee, A. W. Wright, E. D. Childs and T. B. Casey, of Minneapolis. It was also decided that the work of grading and constructing the road should be vigorously pushed during the winter. It is probable that the line will run somewhat south of Leech Lake.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 6. There was an air of mystery surrounding the Senate chamber this afternoon, but more particularly about the movements of Senator Sabin. At an early hour after the Senate convened the doorkeepers informed visitors that Senator Sabin was not to be seen. This aroused suspicion and created no end of comment. It was soon whispered about that Sabin, Senator Allison, of Iowa, and John C. New, of Indiana, were in secret consultation in the Senate committee on appropriations room. He was traced to the rooms of the Republican League club, where the executive committee of the national committee was in session. Here he spent upwards of one hour closeted with Senator Quay and Mr. New. The next seen of the Minnesota senator he was at the Pennsylvania railway station, where he purchased a ticket for the Hoosier capital. While Senator Sabin's movements were clothed in mystery an attempt was made to make them more mysterious by keeping them quiet. All kinds of rumors about his Indianapolis visit and speculation is rife as to what may be its nature. It bears evidence of his having been sent for by Harrison through his lieutenant, Mr. New. Some think it means a cabinet position while others believe it is to consult with him regarding Minnesota and Northwestern matters.

Moorhead News: An effort is being made to have Mr. A. N. Hopkins, of Polk County, now assistant weigher of grain at Duluth, promoted, under the board of railroad and warehouse commissioners to be appointed under Gov. Merriam, to be chief weigher at Duluth, a position for which Mr. Hopkins' friends claim he is eminently qualified by experience, and in every sense deserving of. Mr. Hopkins is an old soldier, a member of the G. A. R., and has been a farmer in Polk County, in which industry he has met with repeated reverses and loss of crops, until he was compelled to give it up and seek other employment. About eighteen months ago he secured the appointment of assistant weigher, at a moderate salary, and we hope his application for preferment will be favorably acted upon by the commissioners.

THE SCRUB MUST GO.

BETTER horses, better cattle, better sheep, better swine, and, above all, better and more economical methods of breeding and management of the live stock of the farm will go a long way towards making our readers a better profit for the year to come. The Breeder's Gazette confessedly covers the entire field of stock-growing more thoroughly than any other periodical of the day, being a beautifully illustrated twenty-four to twenty-eight page weekly, endorsed and patronized by the leading breeders in every State as the brightest, best, and most original publication of its class in the world. National in its circulation and influence, it carries a larger corps of contributors and artists of the highest reputation than any other existing journal devoted to this interest. The livest of all live-stock newspapers.

Terms: Single subscription, $2; two subscriptions, remitted together, $2 each; in clubs of five, $1.75 each; in clubs of ten $1.50 each. Send for free specimen copy, or ten cents in stamps for the great Holiday Number to be issued Dec. 20.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

CROOKSTON, MINN., DECEMBER 20.

Duluth Herald: Gen. Alger, since entering the campaign for the republican presidential nomination, has grown wonderfully in the estimation of the American people. He has been one of the most prominent and active leaders in the campaign and if any one is entitled to any consideration at the hands of the incoming administration it is Michigan's favorite son. But it is said he does not want a thing. His aspiration is to become president and he is already preparing himself for the compaign of 1892. If reports are to be credited he will have no cabinet position in his.

Milk Yield.

Hoard's Dairyman: In reviewing the butter records of our cows we find that 7 cows have made records which average for 30 days 100 lbs. 1 3-4 oz. each, as follows: Albino 2d (3-year-old) 106 lbs. 14 oz.; Clothilde 2d, 104 lbs. 3½ oz.; Lady Griswold, 101 lbs. 10 oz.; Aegis, 100 lbs. 6 oz.; Aegis 2d, 96 lbs. 5¼ oz.; N. Dorinda, 96 lbs. 2¼ oz.; Clothilde, 95 lbs. 2¾ oz., and 19 cows, including one 2-year-old and four 3-year olds, average 92 lbs. 3½ oz. in 30 days. In every case the butter was made after the usual methods, without the addition or use of any ingredient of any kind, except pure cold water, and was worked in good marketable condition and weighed before salting.

SMITHS, POWELL & LAMB.

Syracuse, N. Y.

Peterson's Magazine for January begins the year with fresh attractions and increased merit. The two steel-plates are charming in subject and engraved with great delicacy and finish. "Zoar and the Zoarites," by G. W. Christine, is a very interesting illustrated article; and there is also an illustrated story, "Between Two New Years," by Georgia Grant, which is delightfully told. Edgar Fawcett and the author of "A Second Life" begin serials, which open with great brilliancy and promise. The short stories are as good as they are varied, and "The Care of the Sick," by Miss Scovil, is an admirable and valuable paper. The mammoth fashion-plate gives the newest and most effective styles for costumes. The work-table and embroidery patterns are the prettiest any magazine can boast. The supplement has a handsome design for a bed-spread; it is noticeable as being the largest pattern ever given by any publication. Try "Petterson" for a year, and you will not regret it. Terms: Two dollars, with great reductions when taken in clubs, and elegant premiums for getting up clubs. Send for a sample copy. Address Peterson's Magazine, 306 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Profit and Loss in the Dairy.

Hoard's Dairyman.

The old time rule of having all the dairy cows calve in the spring has been modified in many sections of the country, the Utica Herald observes, and entirely changed in some others, where progressive dairyman approve of fresh cows every month of the year. Quite a number of dairymen claim that prices for dairy products are equalized throughout the twelve months and profits of the year thereby increased, by having a part of one's herd, at least, calve during the fall and early winter months. Advocates of this plan give the assurance that they have fewer sick calves in winter than in summer; that the supply of milk and butter is extended throughout the year instead of being confined to shorter seasons, and that there is more leisure to handle the stock in winter than in summer.

The important point in raisin calves, at whatever season these may have been dropped, is to give the animal a fair start in life, for which purpose nothing equals milk as it is taken from the cow. Though some practice separating the calf from the cow the day after it is dropped, it is generally preferable to let it run with the cow for four or five days, taking all the milk. At least this period ought to elapse after a calf is dropped before the milk will be fit to use as human food. After separating the calf from the cow, new milk should be liberally fed at least two weeks, and if this can be continued even longes, it is advisable. No substitute for new milk should be given under two weeks. After that, however, more economical food may be compounded, if desired, and the calf will still thrive. If skim milk can now be offered, the calf will thrive on liberal feeding.

Willard says that if whey and oil meal be properly prepared it can be made to serve as a good substitute for milk. The whey should be dipped off when sweet from the vat, then bring it to the boiling point and turn it upon the meal. Let the mixture stand till night, then feed. In the morning whey sweet from the vat may be fed. At the commencement a little less than a pint of oil meal per day will be sufficient for four calves. This may be gradually increased until each calf has a daily ration of half a pint. At first it is better not to feed calves all the whey they can drink at a time. A large feed of whey cloys the appetite and deranges the health. A half pail of whey at first is enough for a feed, which may be increased to three-fourths of a pail at a time as the calf increases in age. Two meals a day, if the calf runs in a good pasture, is sufficient. Calves fed in this way ought not to be weaned until they can get a good bite of after feed from the early cut meadows. It is important to keep them in a growing, thrifty condition with no check. When weaned earlier their growth is often checked by reason of short, dry, unnutritious feed in pastures.

When whey is not to be had for feeding young calves, the following is sometimes used: Take three quarts of linseed meal and four quarts of bean meal and mix with thirty quarts of boiling water, when it is left to digest twenty-four hours and is then poured into a boiler on the fire having thirty-one quarts of boiling water. It is here boiled for half an hour, being stirred with a perforated paddle so as to prevent lumps and produce perfect incorporation. It is then set aside to cool and is given blood warm. When first used it it is mixed with milk in a small quantity. The milk is gradually decreased till they get the mucilage only. Indian meal may used in the place of bean meal. Buckwheat meal cooked into a porridge and added to whey is reported to have been used with good results.

It is considered as desirable to hasten maturity of the young animals by good feeding and care, so that it will come into milk at two years, as such heifers make better milkers than those that come in at three years, besides the profit of milk for an extra season.

Important to Lumbermen, and Others Employing Men in Camps.

I am instructed to ask your immediate attention to the necessity of knowing that the men you employ this winter are thoroughly protected by vaccination against small pox. This disease is again prevailing in places adjacent to the lines of travel both in Canada and the United States. It was brought directly through the Canadian quarantine to a township in this state last August, and resulted in eight cases and three deaths. To avoid the terrible experience of a few years ago, vaccination is the sure safeguard. It is as much for the benefit of the men as for yourselves and the people at large. To be safe, therefore, re-vaccinate every one who has not had a successful vaccination within the last five years, and can show a good scar as evidence thereof.

Your foremen should keep a list of the men, in this respect, and should be on their guard against any eruptive disease appearing among them. Instruct them to isolate any one suspicious symptoms, with their clothing and bedding, till a medical opinion, or sufficient time shall develop their true character. I will advise any one of them, promptly, who will write me for the purpose, and will be obliged for the earliest information of anything suspicious, that we may give assistance where needed.

Will you please acknowledge receipt of this circular and give your co-operation to the plan here suggested?

Address, Respectfully yours,
CHARLES N. HEWITT, M. D.
Secr'y State Board of Health.

MORTGAGE SALE.

[First publication Dec. 6th, 1888.]

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of two hundred and eleven dollars and sixty cents, ($211.60,) principal and interest, due and which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by Emeline Henlon, a widow, to Smith W. Fisk, bearing date the twelfth day of March A. D. 1887, and duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the eighteenth day of March A. D. 1887, at 11 o'clock and twenty-five minutes a. m., in book "29" of mortgages on pages 348 and 349, said mortgage was made to secure the payment of a promissory note of even date therewith, for the sum of two hundred dollars ($200 00,) payable on or before one year from the date thereof, made by said Emeline Henlon, payable to said Smith W. Fisk or order and delivered by said mortgagor to said mortgagee at the date thereof, and whereas, the power of sale in said mortgage contained has become operative, and no action or proceedings at law or otherwise has been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, and the premises described in and covered by said mortgage, viz: Lots ten (10,) twelve (12) and fourteen (14,) in block three 3,) in Grand Forks East, according to the recorded plat thereof on file, and of record in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for said County of Polk and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances, said premises being situate in said County of Polk, will be sold at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest and ten dollars attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the costs and disbursements allowed by law, which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said County of Polk, at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said county and state, on the first day of February A. D. 1889, at 10 o'clock a. m., of that day, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated, December 3d, A. D. 1888.

The Senatorial Election.

Brewers Gazette: The Minnesota legislature which meets on the 8th of January has a most important duty to perform in the election of an U. S. senator to succeed Senator Sabin whose term expires on the 4th of March next. Senator Sabin is of course a candidate for re-election.—We say of course, because he has made a faithful and an efficient representative of the interests of the state and acquired an experience which will make his services doubly valuable the next six years. As all party usage in Minnesota has been to endorse a faithful public servant for a second term it is not only natural and proper, but would be an absolute public disappointment if Senator Sabin was not in the field. There is no man in the senate personally more popular than the senator and this gives him a strength that is incalculable.—The men who are often heard in political discussion on the floor of the senate furnish campaign matter for the political parties, but the quiet and popular workers advance the material interests of the constituencies they represent.

Kittson County Enterprise: The question of diversified farming is still held in the balance by some, but the Enterprise has always held to that system as most beneficial and remunerative to the farmers of the county and we offer the following illustrations. Three years ago Otto Mattson, son of the well known Lars Mattson, invested $60 in a colt six months old. Said colt was of good breed, but had the same care that other colts had. When two years old the young mare was bred and the past season has raised a colt that Mr. Mattson has refused $75 for. A short time since, while in Kennedy he was offered $275 in cash for the three year old mare, but refused it, knowing that the keeping was but a small item, and the value of the best with her offspring for the next three years would pay better than all the wheat he could raise, suppose each season a colt was raised, at $75 each when six months old, would realize $225, or when mature, and include the last spring's colt he would realize, if forced to sell at the low price of $150, the sum of $600 besides having the mother in reserve. Good horses are worth more than the price named and will allow for the yearling and two-year-old at that figure. Raise horses and cattle by all means on your farms, then if your wheat crop is a failure you have stock to put on the market.

Little Falls Transcript: "Senator D. M. Sabin is a candidate for re-election, and if the proper performance of duties and able service to the state are the determining factors in the election, he will be his own successon beyond a doubt. He is a man whom the State of Minnesota and the republican party can be proud of as a representative in the senate, hand he has certainly earned the endorsement of a re-election. Mr. Sabin has been a power in Minnesota politics for many yeas, and his friends are to-day more numerous than ever before. He has always been a staunch republican, and commands the respect of the party leaders throughout the nattion. He is in sympathy with the element in the republican party that has wrested the party in this state from the control of an old ring of leaders that have tried for years to keep down every young aswirant who dared to act independently of these old leaders. We believe that representatives of the younger element of republicans can contral the legislature, and Mr. Sabin is a man who has given them aid in the past in their battles. The St. Paul and Minneapolis papers are actively opposing him, but their influence is not as powerful as it once was. Their effort to belittle Mr. Sabin's strength in this fight is unfair, as it is certain that he has at least as many followers as any other candidate, and we believe that he will have the support of the majority of the republican members."

Brewers Gazette: There is no doubt that the reappointment of Mr. Ives, by Gov. Merriam would be an act of wisdom, as he has proven honest, vigilant and masterful in the discharge of his present duties, as amply shown by his annually reports, and the state ought not to lose his services. He has the capacity to stand at the head of a Food Inspection bureau and make that work of a value that would be greater, in our judgment, than that of any other man in the state, for the reason that he is both a student and practical man, and best of all endowed with sterling common sense.

In advocating the reappointment of Mr. Ives we speak the voice of many, dairymen, farmers, consumers and business men.

Hoard's Dairyman: Dr. N. H. Whitfield, Aberdeen, Miss., has a Holstein cow that yields two and one-fourth pounds of butter per day, or fifteen and three-fourths pounds per week. Pretty good for any breed.

STATE PRESS.

A PRETTY GOOD REPUBLICAN.

Little Falls Transcript.

Some of the papers of the state are intimating that Senator Sabin is not a good enough Republican to represent Minnesota in the senate. He has since his election, served as chairman of the Republican National committee, and that fact ought to establish his standing in the party.

FAITHFUL AND EFFICIENT.

Carver County News.

Senator Sabin may congratulate himself upon the bright prospect of his reelection to the U. S. Senate. From all sides words of commendation as to his faithfulness and efficiency are heard, and we doubt not, will be affirmed by our state legislators.

DOES NOT PRETEND TO SAY.

Fairmount News.

A few of the reasons why the News looks favorably upon the re-election of Senator Sabin, are these: First, he has had one term, and a man of the ability of Mr. Sabin must have learned much in that time in the United States senate and hence would be of infinitely more advantage to his constituents than a new member could possibly be, no matter how brilliant. Again, Mr. Sabin has a remarkable faculty of approaching men, winning their confidence, earning their esteem, binding them closely to him, and in these respects it is doubtful if he has his peer in Minnesota and his rare social qualities go for a great deal in Washington, much farther than many people suppose. We do not pretend to say that Mr. Sabin is all the man in Minnesota who is fit for a United States senator. but at the present writing it appears that he is not only the most available but that he is the best man for the interests of the state.

THE OPINION OF A FARMERS' ALLIANCE PAPER.

Central Minnesotian.

One of the most important questions to come before the Minnesota legislature this winter is a senatorial successor to Sen. Sabin, Mr. Sabin is a staunch Republican. We have yet to hear a Republican paper besmirch his character. It is true he is a man of wealth, but so is Merriam, Pillsbury and Washburn. In fact it is difficult for a man to get office without wealth or wealthy backers. Mr. Sabin aspires to be his own successor. Knute Nelson is often spoken of. As to his views on this subject, he is as silent as Grant on war-policies. The "Sage of Nininger," our friend Donnelly, is also a candidate. We're not going back on the Cryptogram! After the lofty politicians of this generation—who sit on the pinnacle of court houses and hen roosts—have passed beneath the mantle of oblivion, Donnelly will still live in literature as one of its famous children. But Donnelly can't be senator. Mr. Sabin is one of the most enterprising citizens of Minnesota, and if fate decree, will leave the office of Senator with honors and credit.

MR. SABIN OUGHT TO SUCCEED.

Kenyon Leader.

The first question at istue is, shall Mr. Sabin be his own successor, or shall he not? Should the question be answered by our legislature in the negative, a second question will arise—who is the coming man? We believe there is a strong and growing sentiment among the people of this part of the state in favor of the present incumbent. Mr. Sabin has ably represented the state during the past six years to the complete satisfaction of his friends and to the great disappointment of those who opposed his election. His record is clear and untarnished, and we see no reason why the political courtesy of a second term should not be extended to him. It is evident that our state legislature could do much worse than to return Senator Sabin, and in view of the fact that candidates interested in moneyed corporations and sectional issues are numerous, and that pledges have already been secured from members who will resort to all manner of schemes in their behalf, it would look to us like an exercise of wisdom on the part of legislative members to consider well this important matter before deciding to be instrumental in bringing about any change in the situation. In relation to Mr. Washburn personally, we have not a word to say. That he will have the united support of the twin cities there exists but little doubt, but we are of the opinion that members of the rural parts of the state will oppose him on point of location if for no other reason. His raidroad interests will also be a theme for discussion, and the agricultural community, ever jealous of the prosperity, power and influence of railroad corporations, will oppose him to the bitter end.

THE PEOPLE VS RAILROAD RINGS.

Windom Reporter.

The transportation and tariff questions are the most vital ones before Congress so far as the west is conned, in a business point of view.

The inter-state law and its underlying principle, government control of railroads, are in their infancy yet, and and it can hardly be just to the intelligence of Gen. Washburn to maintain that if elected senator he will support a measure and assist in its passage which is a direct curtailment of railroad interests, in which Gen. Washburn's great fortune and the fortunes of his eastern friends interested in railroad development are involved. The inter-state law is yet defective and needs improvement and perfection in the direction of bringing the railroads into subjection to the will of the people, and great as our confidence is in Gen. Washburn's wealth, probity of character, etc., we do not believe he can be depended upon to assist in the perfection of the inter-state law in the interests of the people. That must be done by the friends of the people, and not by the men who have the many millions of their own fortunes as well as the millions of other people's fortunes at heart.

It matters little to us who is United States senator so long as a man with interests in common with the people is elected. But such is not Gen. Washburn. His interests are not those of the people but those of the Vanderbilts, the Goulds, and the lesser lights of railroad fame. If the people want that kind of a senator they may take him. That Washburn built the "Soo" road and that it is a great equalizer of rates, etc., is not an argument in his favor. However great a boon it may temporarily be, when it becomes too serious a competitor for any of the Chicago lines and they want to buy it, Mr. Washburn's great business foresight will induce him to pool, and if not pool satisfactorily, sell to the interest that will pay him the most money. He has built other roads to sell, and no one questions the benefit to the great cities. As to Sabin's wealth, we have but little information, but his record in congress has been upon the side of the people. Even if in dollars and cents the two men are at "a stand off," Sabin's business interests are allied with those of the people on the transportation question, and not hostile to them. Upon the tariff he represents a low rate of protection, and his whole record, so far as we know, has been in the line of tariff reduction, keeping in view the proper degree of protection. But on the money question we fear a comparison with Washburn's interest, who, stripped of the enormous wealth he possesses, without stopping to question how so much wealth has been piled up, would not leave him a man of any greater ability or character than Sabin or any other of the common herd. Sabin may not be an ideal statesman, but he has interests in common with the common people and is in a position to represent them rather than the railroad kings of America, against whom they are battling.

ACTED WITH WISDOM AND CAUTION.

Waconia News.

The election of United States senator is absorbing much interest in Minnesota politics just now. Sedator Sabin of Stillwater is in the field as his own successor, and from a cursory glance over the "field" the prospect for his return looks bright. A cabinet position, which it is said would be offered him, fails to draw him from his first love. Mr. Sabin during this, his first term, has acted with wisdom and caution, always with an eye to the advancement of Minnesota's interests,

HE HAS BEEN WITH THE YOUNG MEN.

Little Falls Transcript.

Senator D. M. Sabin is a candidate for re-election, and if the proper performance of duties and able service to the state are the determining factors in the election he will be his own successor beyond a doubt. He is a man whom the State of Minnetota and the Republican party can be proud of as a representative in the Senate, and he has certainly earned the endorsement of a re-election. Mr. Sabin has been a power in Minnesota politics for many years, and his friends to-day are more numerous than ever before. He has always been a staunch Republican, and commands the respect of the party leaders throughout the nation. WANTS A YOUNGER MAN.

Heron Lake News.

We are receiving a good many "clippings from papers booming W. D. Washburn for senator. The News admires Mr. Washburn for his ability, but believes a younger and more active man would be of more service to the state.

SABIN INTIMATES WITH PRESIDENT HARRISON.

Worthington Globe.

The Globe is not yet altogether certain whether Senator Sabin ought not to succeed himself. The present senator is an intimate friend of the president-elect, and for this reason he might be able to meet with better success with the affairs of this state. The Globe will investigate the matter more closely in the near future, and will give its views as to who is the best man.

STRONG AND INFLUENTIAL WORKER.

Hutchinson Leader.

When Senator Sabin was seated in Congress by the legislature of Minnesota, the sentiment against him among the people verged upon hatred and he might as well have asked for the moon as an elective office. It is alleged that this feeling has been softened somewhat by his course and record in the senate, where he has been in many respects a strong and influential worker for Minnesota and that the state will not suffer if he is returned to congress.

Windom Reporter.

The yell of the country newspapers seems to be "statesmanship" as a requisite for United States senator, and peculiarly the friends of statesmanship are pointing to a railroad president as the only available man to take Sabin's place, If railroad statesmanship is desired by the people in these times of transportation legislation, when the interests of the great west are deeply involved, no doubt an intelligent, capable, far-seeing railroad president would make a most valuable senator. But there are people who believe that the great transportation question should not be legislated upon by railroad presidents, and when the legislature meets they will doubtless be heard from.

A KIND WORD FOR SABIN.

Jordan Independent.

The press in favor of Washburn's candidacy for senator, are reporting that Sabin has withdrawn from the contest in order to damage his chances. Sabin is still in the ring and we would be pleased to see him chosen in preference to Washburn.

WHAT HON. J. A. LEONARD THINKS.

Rochester Post.

Hon. D. M. Sabin is a candidate for re-election with a fair show of success. He has been an excellent senator and in all the questions pertaining to the control of corporations and the protection of labor his record has been particularly good and in accord with the popular sentiment of the state. He has well represented the mass of the people.

Minnesota Hogs.

Farm, Stock and Home: A recent visit to the stock yards at South St. Paul revealed the fact that while Minnesota is gaining in the quality and quantity of her hogs the gain in both directions is much too slow for either the credit of the state or the profit of her farmers. Not only the largest number but the best hogs received are from Iowa and Missouri. One of the insipectors of hogs at the yards was asked why the quality of Minnesota hogs is inferior. He replied that it is not, in all cases; in fact, some extremely fine lots have been received from this state, but the average made a showing of inferiority. The breed seemed to be all right, but too many of the animals graded as "coarse," were not fine, solid meated, or as heavy as was desired by the packers. The reasons assigned for this were that the hogs had been given too little care during the summer, had been kept on grass or other pasturage, without grain of any sort, and were sold to the first buyer that came around, without waiting to finish off the product by a few weeks of judicious corn-feeding.

The bulk of the summer feed should be pasturage, of course, but a little grain, such as wheat middlings, screenings, bran, corn meal, etc., will cost but little and go a long way towards making the pigs weigh more and bring a higher price per pound. From some portions of the state hogs are coming which show that the farmers there have "caught the nearest way," but from other parts the receipts clearly show that swine growing is not properly understood there. The wheat screenings so freely given away by our farmers contain the germ of better and more profitable hog growing in this region.

The skin of the toads was dry and shriveled, but after remaining under a stove for two days, recovered its freshness and the toads became as lively as possible.

Seal and plush caps at the C. O. D Clothing House.

The newspaper fraternity north as far as the boundary line and every one with whom we have talked, unite in requesting Gov. Merriam for the appointment of J. G. McGrew as railroad commissioner. They say, and with truth that the great Red River Valley is more vitally interested in the wheat question than any other portion of the state and it is but simple justice that her interests be represented on the board. They have united on Capt. McGrew and the governor could not do a handsomer thing for Polk County than to appoint one of her citizens to this important position.

Francis is the only photographer in the northwest doing first-class cabinet photographs for $2.50 per dozen.

We dropped in upon our brethren of the press at Warren, last Thursday. Bro. Mussey, of the Sheaf, we found up to his eyes in business -talking of a new steam press, etc. etc. etc., and getting ready to visit the Saintly city. If he likes it mebbe he will buy it and present it to Jim Hill for a Christmas gift as a slight return for a nice large new depot which Warren has(n't) got; and an elegant(?) train service which she has got. We found lawyer Stevens in his cosy editorial den, wrinkling his classical brow over the almanac while he diligently sought for knowledge about St. John's day. He seemed to be enjoying a rush of job work—that panacea for all the woes the printer's flesh is heir to—as he complacently remarked that he didn't care a whoop whether school kept or Donnelly was elected so long as it was sure that the Northwest could not capture the senatorial persimmons. Bro. Stevens is for the Northwest and its citizens first, last and all the time. We found our legal friend, Grindeland, trying to loan a native of the soil a cool million or so of penge. Nothing small about G; he would loan the earth on good security. We met Warren's genial lumber merchant, McArthur, who tried to talk an arm off us, but we wouldn't have it and managed to hold our own until Guy Aubol got so hungry, that, out of pity, we accompanied him to the Windsor, where mine host McIntyre had a fine dinner, which beat roasted ox, (either over or under done) all hollow. L. D. Marshall was there, who tried his best to fool us out of our dinner by entertaining stories. Lucky, as a preliminary, he told of a man who had recently been to Tacoma. When asked how he liked that country he said: "He did not like the climate and he did not like the society!" Looking gravely up into Marshall's face, with his own peculiar dignity, lawyer Wm. Watts, remarked: "Well, it strikes me that those are the chief objections to"—well, he did not even fetch a smile and the effect was so chilling upon Marshall's humorous vein that the guests had an opportunity to finish their dinners in quietness. We got so lonesome after that that we tried to skip the town (with Marshall and Jack Kivel) without saying anything to mine host McIntyre, but Mac wouldn't have it that way and corralled us later. Mac keeps one of the neatest and cosiest little country hotels it has been our fortune to visit lately and deserves the fine trade he is getting. All that Warren needs now is lots of patience and another railroad.

Wm. Watts went up to Warren on Friday last on business connected with the Shook matter. Watts was non-committal as to the object of his visit, but someoow the facts leaked out.

The Argyle Banner entered upon its seventh year, last issue, under very favorable auspices indeed—it has a national bank behind it. Aside from that very unusual and very agreeable feature, the Banner is an excellent local paper well worth a far more liberal patronage than it seems to get. We have seen the Banner every week during its life, and we could not help a feeling of surprise when we went about Argyle and realized the amount of patronage the paper ought to have, knowing what it really has. It is a fact that people in a city or village little realize the impressions strangers get by the local papers or they certainly would take more pride in them and do more for themselves and their papers than they do. The banner is a good live local paper and deserves a liberal patronage.

We stopped for a few brief moments in Stephen, on Thursday, last to chat with friends, while the train waited for time to overtake her. We found our friends, the Bivens, enjoying(?) the mumps, and longing for the time when they could return to Crookston. We found Dr. Finney, the genial editor of the Leader, immersed in business, (as usual.) The doctor is a pleasant, genial gentleman and it is no wonder that he is so popular. We talked with our new representative, the Hon. Geo. R. Roberts, and he impressed us as a sober practical, earnest man, intent on learning the full wants of the people and studying a way to supply them. If he does make any mistakes we have the assurance that it will not be by wilfulness or carelessness. Mr. Roberts is a serious, every-day man, well posted on the important needs of this country, and that he will creditably discharge his duties we feel assured. He is not a man who thinks he knows it all by any means, but he is ever ready and anxious to listen to any and all suggestions and he is desirous to find out the ideas and opinions of each and every one of his constituents from the least unto the greatest. He is a safe man to tie to.

Frank Church has started a new hack line in the city, with Turner Fadden as manager. The new line starts in with the firm determination to win the approbation of all, and invites patronage.

Having heard many complaints against the train service north, we took a spin down to Hallock last Thursday. We did not get dizzy from fast riding, as it only took us from 6:30 a. m., till noon to reach Hallock. We had plenty of time to visit a half hour or so at every station and we really can't see what people can have to KICK so much about —unless they are in a HURRY. But then, some people are so constituted that they would find fault about it if they were going to be hung. As we steamed rapidly into Hallock station, as lively as a snail, the citizens gathered at the depot, breathless with excitement at the unusual speed, fearful least the trainmen had all gone crazy or else that something serious had happened. Mine host Woodworth conducted us to Hotel Hallock, where an excellent dinner awaited us, and he looked right happy to secure a traveller off that train—says that's twice that same thing has happened since the change in time —both on compulsion. HAD to go over the line. Too lazy to walk. After an excellent dinner (we partook of every course) we went out to interview our friends. First, (of course) we sought our brother quill-driver, Love, of the Enterprise. We found him enjoying a big run of custom and breathing forth threatnings and slaughter forninst the good Deacon, who threatens to invade his truck patch, but otherwise calm and serene and as handsome as ever. Love is getting out a good paper creditable to Hallock and is a hard worker for the interests of the Northwest. Says the train service is a serious drawback to the country. We found the Messrs. McCollom & Suffel up to their eyes in business. This is the annual settling and if you want to talk with Mac. or Alf., all you have got to do is to grab a button, hang on and follow 'em on the hen run all over the store, and town like enough. They report better times than they anticipated earlier in the season and say everything would be in pretty fair shape if only they could have decent train service. It is really more of a detriment to business men than any one can realize until they try it. P. H. Konzen appeared as happy as a clam at high tide in the sure prospects of future happiness when his ship arrives. Our impression is that there should be a passenger train put on, making the same time as formerly We understand that the company claims that there is not enough business to warrant but it does seem as though the country is entitled to some consideration. The freights in the past have no doubt yielded a very handsome profit and will again in the future so that a general average would balance the thing up all right, and the company would not be the loser in the end. At any rate, if they showed a disposition to accommodate their patrons by giving it a trial, people would not feel so bitter as now they do with the feeling that the company does not care a rap for them.

Ex-representative, A. H. Baker, was up from Ada on Saturday last. He says that he hopes to see Mr. D. M. Sabin succeed himself, "for," said he, "I know the man and I know that the New Northwest has no firmer, no truer friend than the Hon. D. M. Sabin. He is a man of the people and I should consider it a calamity to the people of this country if he is defeated."

We satisfy all our customers, we ask no bonus, and we pay over money on loans the moment notes are signed.

We dropped off at Argyle last Friday for an hour or so to chat with the boys there. Bro. Richardson, of the Banner, being absent on a visit to St. Paul, we had to be satisfied trying to talk an arm off his partner, H. L. Melgaard. We found Pete Bauchemin, our old-time fellow-citizen, as busy as a bee and as happy as a clam at high tide. By the way, Pete is getting to be a bloated bondholder or "somedings like dot," as he has one of the most elegant residences in the city, conveniently located in the suburbs. It is a model of neatness and comfort, and Pete justly takes pride in it. We had not been long in the city when J. D. Bill, the photographer, got his eagle eye onto our lovely, classical countenance and nothing to do but that he must capture it to preserve in his cabinet of antiquarian specimens. We are not given to such luxuries, but we could not resist his gentle pleadings as he furthermore agreed to stand all damage which the masheen might sustain. We suffered the infliction of a "full" life sized counterfeit presentment and left him trying to doctor a wrecked camera. J. D. was one of the first artists in Crookston, was a good one then and has not lost any of his skill. He is doing a good business. Argyle, as to business, will compare favorably with any town along the line, though business cannot be said to be overly booming. Collections are promptly paid or satisfactorily adjusted, and everybody is building high hopes upon the outcome of the next crop.

The boarders at Hotel Hallock rather think the joke is on landlord Woodworth. Last Thursday an honest granger brought him a load of wood and in the deal, Woodworth agreed to give the man his dinner. Well, the granger moseyed into the dining room and safely stowed his 7 benign stogas under the capacious table, as the sylph-like form of the star-eyed goddess, who serves as the animated pendulum that swings to and fro between the kitchen and dining room, waltzed cheerfully up and perching upon his starboard shoulder warbled sweetly in his auricular appendage "Barley Soup, Sir?" The granger was "in the soup," and blandly replied: "Ay tank ay skoll tak mene dinner!" Directly the soup was served up, steaming hot and in just about two seconds less than no time at all the soup had disappeared from mortal sight, and the granger deliberately arose and departed into the sitting room, remarking: "Ay tank Hotel Holleck ben puty big hotel for sutze leetla dinner mena a tank a skoll go down fernenst oyster hus en ay skoll worry two tree dozen oysters lak hal; Ay tank dem vil fit into dat barley field al rate nuff! Ay tank ay skoll mak bargain vid Woodworth for riggly dinner, for fem a swansy cent, some wasday agen not mutz; vat you dank?" A few minutes later he was seen at Delmonico's restaurant, near the post-office, calmly discussing the merits of solids in the shape of potatoes and meat; but great was the wrath of the divinity of the dining-room when, a few seconds after the hasty departure she arrived for further orders and found the guest had departed. The boys insist that the joke was on Woodworth, while we are inclined to think it was on the honest (but hasty) granger.

Check.

The Pope M'f'g. Co., send out an advertising calendar pad, costing, perhaps, 10 cts., for which they have the sublime gall to request publishers to insert a $5 local notice. The pad itself is an ad. for a year and any reasonable hog ought to be satisfied with that—but there are some who are not satisfied with having the earth, but insist upon having a little wire fence around it.

Almost a Fire.

On Saturday last as Mr. I. U. Jennings was walking along Robert St., he saw smoke issuing from beneath Jacobus' piazza. Investigating, he found a healthy young fire getting ready to jump Jake's claim but by a few pails of water judiciously applied he soon dispelled the invader and won the case for Jake.

A CHRISTMAS SONG;

In winter-time, when earth is drest
In robes of snowy white,
And peeping from their prickly nest
Shine holly-berries bright;
When the sky is gray and the air is chill,
And the frost-bound river is hushed and still,
The Christmas bells ring out their mirth
To greet the day of Jesus' birth.

Hark! hark! they ring, "Good news for men?
Let tears and sorrows cease,
For Christmas comes with grace again,
Good-will and joy and peace!"
The angels to-day are busy on earth
With praises from Heaven for the Saviour's birth,
While glory in the highest rings
To Jesus Christ, the king of kings.

The night is dark, the earth is cold,
Yet Jesus leaves his throne;
To simple hearts the tale is told,—
"He cometh to his own!"
But the world goes on, for its eyes are dim,
And its selfish heart has no thought for him,
Though Bethlehem is filled to-night
With glory from the light of light.

And heavenly joy shall flood each soul
Which truly worships there,
And learns that love whose sweet control
Makes Christmas everywhere;
And life's winter-time shall be bright for them,
With faith in the story of Bethlehem;
The Father's love, the Saviour's birth,
Glory in heaven, and peace on earth.

BEBE'S GOLD PIECE.

How It Brought Many Instead of one Christmas Gift.

One bright afternoon in November two girls sat chatting in the cozy boudoir of the elder of the two. The house of which this sanctum formed a part was situated on the outskirts of Cloverdale. All the surroundings testified to refined and cultivated taste, and no prettier picture need be desired than the one formed by our heroines as they sit side by side in earnest but subdued conversation. The open fire tended to add picturesqueness as well as comfort to the apartments, and the tout ensemble formed a pleasant contrast to the dark picture of woe which had been so vividly described in the magazine one of the two held in her hand.

Both girls were pretty and at an age where one would suppose them almost totally unacquainted with the depth and meaning of life which either sorrow or pain are sure to teach to us poor mortals, sooner or later in our onward journey. The senior by a few months, however, had from the time of babyhood, known but few moments untortured by agonizing throes, for when only three years of age a careless nurse had let her fall from a swing, since which time, in spite of all that devoted love and the highest medical skill could do to mitigate the evil, or gain a few moments of ease to the tortured form, the poor child was to pass hours of such physical agony as taxed the nerves of all who witnessed her fortitude and patience.

The brave little spirit forced so early in the conflict to accept the inevitable, did so bravely, gently and heroically, so much so that she preached a sermon without words every hour of her existence. Her mother, a widow with comparatively limited means, idolized her ewelamb, and friends innumerable vied in sending to Dulcie Latrobe (for such was her name), every delicacy to tempt the appetite, or work of art and beauty to adorn her own especial sanctum, which thought and love could suggest, and thus make it an abode worthy the bright and sunshiny spirit who gave such individualities to even the immediate things surrounding her.

Not a young girl for miles around but went to Dulcie with every grievance, real or imaginary, as it arose, and when those who so loved her protested against this selfish egotism, Dulcie was so grieved and disturbed that they were forced to withdraw their opposition, and it was now an accepted fact that perplexity and trouble were naturally brought to this frail little maiden for a solution of the difficulty, or a salve to heal the wound.

Just now it was Bebe Allcot who was pouring out her sorrows in the sympathizing ear of her friend. Bebe had been, until a few months past, a favored child of fortune, and had but to look or express a wish and it was gratified. But the wheel of fate had turned and our poor little girl, all unfit to meet the exegencies of the ordeal, was in sore strait indeed.

It was sad to see the despondent droop of the pretty head with its wealth of golden curls, or the quiver of the rosebud mouth as she exclaimed:

"Oh, Dulcie! what does it mean? Why should one have all the joys of life crowded in a few short years and then without fault of one's own, have it all taken away, even to love and tenderness such as darling little Gracie and I had lavished upon us in our own dear home. Father—mother—both gone and I with baby Gracie left with no one to speak a kindly, helpful word; no means save a paltry sum almost worse than nothing to help us exist in a home, so changed that it no longer deserves so sacred a name!"

Poor, poor Bebe! A stouter heart than hers might well have quailed as she, in narrating realized to the full her trials and difficulties; born and reared in a palatial home and the daughter of a reputed millioniare who was considered so far lifted above the frowns of "adverse fate" that no one dreamed that evil, in a financial form, could touch him or his. He had met sudden death in a railway accident and it was found that speculation had lured him to his ruin; his collosal fortune had been engulfed and his family left with but the few thousands settled upon his wife in the earlier days of their marriage. He would have died to save them a pang, but through culpable recklessness, entailed worse than death upon them.

His wife, a confirmed invalid suffering with heart disease, did not live to meet the reverse; within a few hours after hearing of her husband's death, she too, had crossed the river and solved for herself the mysteries of life, one of which was now sorely troubling Bebe. The ways and wherefores trouble us all, but they will be justified and made clear to us when we shall have questioned to the end and have already felt how trivial were our sorest, direst sorrows here.

The orphan girls had but few relatives and the numerous friends who encircled them when the sun of prosperity shone so brightly (without meaning unkindly) had, by degrees, allowed other interests to engage their attention; thus the children of the former millionaire now occupied rooms on the third floor amongst the least desirable of any in the house, tolerated by a half uncle and his wife and left to their own devices from day to day till oftimes Bebe felt active unkindness would be preferable to the utter ignoring of their wants, mentally or physically.

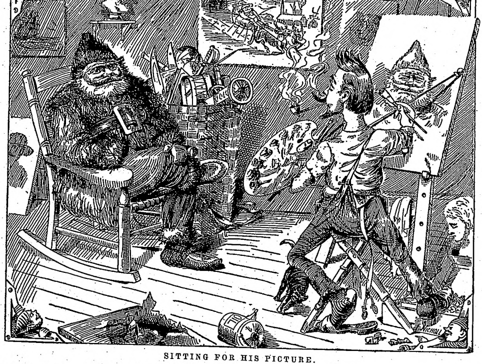
Dulcie well knew she could do but little to ameliorate the woes of her poor friend, but what she could do she would, and just now she strove to divert Bebe from dwelling further upon the sad state of affairs which so shadowed her life. She, whilst resolving to use her influence with her own personal friends to transfer their generous donations of fruit, flowers and more lasting, if less beautiful things, from herself to the children who so needed added brightness and cheer, threw her arms carelessly around her friend and by degrees turned the conversation into other channels, first of all pleading with her not to yield to the despondency so clearly written in every line of her face.

"Better days will surely come, dear Bebe, but in the meantime you must brace up for little Gracie's sake; it is hard and will remain so, but why make it worse by so constantly repining?"

Relating a few items of interest concerning mutual friends she won Bebe to take some part in the conversation and finally exclaimed:

"We have been planning such a pretty cot for Gracie when she and you come to us at Christmas, as you know you must!"

With the name of Christmas in her ears, Bebe turned pale and said:



SITTING FOR HIS PICTURE.

"Oh, Dulcie, what have I to do with merry-making, and use for gifts? All the pleasure of planning and assorting them is gone forever. I have not the means to give the poorest. I have treasured up my last gold piece to get my pet the doll she fancied in Alton's window, but even the pleasure of giving her that is allayed by knowing how many little pleasures the sum paid for it would procure her."

"What!" exclaimed Dulcie, with such a mine of wealth complain of not being able to give your friends tokens of remembrance at Christmas? Why, Bebe, you can do wonders! Gracie will be far more pleased with your daintily-made gifts than with anything money alone could buy."

And before Bebe realized it she was discussing, interestedly, the various articles to be made and calculating the cost of each. The result of the deliberation left her with a glow on her cheeks, and light in her eyes such as had not been seen there since misfortune had overtaken her.

We will take the liberty of looking over the attractive articles which were first on the list owing to the ease and facility with which even a novice in the work could complete them. We will also write our directions, as Dulcie did, for the making of them. Many other handsomer gifts, were later accomplished, but none did more to beguile Bebe from dwelling on the trouble, though as the weeks went on she learned to use needle, thread and thimble to such good purpose that she became a helpful assistant to Dulcie in fashioning garments for many poor little ones out of the cast-off clothing of herself and those around her; learning, too, how full and rich a life can be when hopeful deeds for others give an interest and meaning to it.

Below is enumerated the first fancy articles made by Bebe with the assistance of the veritable sunbeam who brightened not only her's but many other lives:

A UNIQUE WHISK-BROOM HOLDER.—Take a grocers' cuff (one with top hollowed out), paint it cream color and gild top and bottom in about one inch band, a little ways from edge. A bunch of gilded acorns with ribbon loops interspersed was the decoration upon one universally admired. Suspended by narrow ribbons; two colors with loops of same where it is fastened to cuff.

A PRETTY AND SIMPLE SACHET.—Take a clam shell, bore a hole through it large enough to pass two pieces of narrow ribbon through. Gild the shell and trace Xmas upon it in any color you like; now make a satchet to fit in the shell of any colored satin you prefer; fringe the ends and tie with contrasting colored ribbon, glue to shell and having passed ribbons through hole made for purpose, tie in long loops and you are through.

CROCHEED HANDKERCHIEF CASE.—Crotchet of cream colored zephyr in tricot or Afghan. Stitch one piece 10 1-2 inches in length, 7 1-2 inches in width, which is used for foundation of case for pockets; crochet in same stitch two pieces 7 inches in width, 4 1-2 inches in depth; either work initial on the pockets, or stars or other ornamentations, at irregular intervals over them, using each stitch as you would a square in cross stitch for the purpose. When this is done, take split zepher, any color you fancy and crotchet in single stitch a row around large piece and pockets, after which do a second row of 4 long trebles in a stitch, 1 ch, skip 5 stitches, 4 l t m; next stitch entirely around large piece at top of pockets only, finish off with 2 double crochet in center of 4 l t c 5, ch 2, d c in same, stitch 4 ch, 1 d c over, ch 1 in preceeding row. 4 ch, 4 d c in center of 4 l t, so on to end of row. Now take glazed batting, sprinkle well with satchet powder, cover with silk of any color you wish, or better still to correspond with crochet border. Sew this neatly on to under side of case or pockets. You can if you desire add ribbon to tie together but it is not essential and is so dainty and pretty as it is that one scarcely deems it requisite.

HAIR RECEIVER.—Take a Japanses fan, cover with any colored silk or plush you like, line the reverse side. pocket is made shape of the fan, turn. The under and shirred at top to form a gathering, and is also gathered at outer edges, and should reach with 2¼ to 3 inches from upper edge of fan. A celluloid "back" comb is fastened across the pocket immediately below the frill; loops or tri-colored ribbons and ends decorate each end of comb and are also placed at extreme end of fan. A heavy cord furnishes a finish both simple and elegant. Suspend by ribbon loops tied on handle. This was among a very unique assortment of articles sent to a fair not long since and was admired by all. A palm leaf (small one) will answer every purpose for this receiver, the distance of pocket from handle being determined by shape of fan.

MATCH RECEIVER.—Obtain a small globe-shape basket, gild it, and fasten on one side a bunch of acorns (also gilded), and to this attach a ribbon as if used to tie the acorns in place; next, add two pieces of narrowest ribbon, contrasting shades, to hang it up by, making loops at each side where it is fastened to basket. You may if you like, place below the basket a bag of two colored silks used alternately of course, same color as ribbon by which it is hung; if you wish to attach the bag remove the bottom carefully from basket, having previously made the tiny reticule, shirr at top and sew on to the basket; now add a glass to fit and your pretty ornament is done.—Daughter of America.

An Entirely New Court.

The whole court at Berlin is now entirely composed of new people. people. The friends of the late emperor have disappeared and the emperor and empress are surrounded by people entirely of their own choosing and sympathies. CHRISTMAS.

BY JEAN CARLETON.

Oh, the tinkle, tinkle, tinkle
Of the bells on Christmas Eve!
Dashing on with merry sledges,
What a melody they weave!
Christmas chimings full of laughter
On the echoing frosty air,
Ringing through the brilliant city
To a joy-song everywhere!

Oh, the sprinkle, sprinkle, sprinkle
Of the diamond-powdered snow!
Flashing from the cloudy portals
To the crowded street below;
Tufting Christmas-tolling belfries
With a mantle pure and white,
Crunched to music on the pavements
Through the happy, joyous night.

Oh, the twinkle, twinkle, twinkle
Of the stars on Christmas morn
Shining as they shone at Bethl'em
On the hour our Christ was born;
Glinting smiles for human rapture,
Misty dimmed at human tears,
Warders at the heavenly portals
Through the march of onward years!

Oh, the tinkle, sprinkle, twinkle,
Bells and snow and stars so fair,
Music, robe, and glow—Kris Kringle
Sees their influence everywhere!
Oh, ye warders of our pleasures,
Ring, and glow, and gleam alway!
Usher in the golden dawning
Of another Christmas Day!

A CHRISTMAS SERMON.

It would be a pity of the world to destroy it, because it would be next to impossible to make another holiday as good as Christmas. Perhaps there is no danger, but the American people have developed an unexpected capacity for destroying things; they can destroy anything. They have even invented a phrase for it—running a thing into the ground. They have perfected the art of making so much of a thing as to kill it; they can magnify a man or a recreation or an institution to death. And they do it with such a hearty good-will and enjoyment. Their motto is that you cannot have too much of a good thing. They have almost made funerals unpopular by over-elaboration and display, especially what are called public funerals, in which an effort is made to confer great distinction on the dead. So far has it been carried often that there has been a reaction of popular sentiment, and people have wished the man were alive. We prosecute everything so vigorously that we speedily either wear it out or wear ourselves out on it, whether it is a game, or a festival, or a holiday. We can use up any sport or game ever invented quicker than any other people. We can practice anything, like vegetable diet, for instance, to an absurd conclusion with more vim than any other nation. This trait has its advantages; nowhere else will a delusion run so fast, and so soon run up a tree—another of our happy phrases. There is a largeness and exuberance about us which run even into our ordinary phraseology. The sympathetic clergyman, coming from the bedside of a parishioner dying of dropsy, says, with a heavy sigh, "The poor fellow is just swelling away."

Is Christmas swelling away? If it is not, it is scarcely our fault. Since the American nation fairly got hold of the holiday—in some parts of the country, as New England, it has been universal only about fifty years —we have made it hum, as we like to say. We have appropriated the English convivilality, the German simplicity, the Roman pomp, and we have added to it an element of expense in keeping with our own greatness. Is anybody beginning to feel it a burden, this sweet festival of charity and good-will, and to look forward to it with apprehension? Is the time approaching when we shall want to get somebody to play it for us, like base ball? Anything that interrupts the ordinary flow of life, introduces into it, in short, a social cyclone that upsets everything for a fortnight, may in time be as hard to bear as that festival of housewives called house-cleaning, that riot of cleanliness which men fear as they do a panic in business. Taking into account the present preparations for Christmas, and the time it takes to recover from it, we are beginning—are we not?—to consider it one of the most serious events of modern life.

The Drawer is led into these observations out of its love for Christmas. It is impossible to conceive of any holiday that could take its place, nor indeed would it seem that human wit would invent another so adapted to humanity. The obvious intention of it is to bring together, for a season at least, all men in the exercise of a common charity and a feeling of good-will, the poor and the rich, the successful and the unfortunate, that all the world may feel that in the time called the Truce of God the thing common to all men is the best thing in life. How will it suit this intention, then, if in our way of exaggerated ostentation of charity the distinction between rich and poor is made to appear more marked than on ordinary days? Blessed are those that expect nothing. But are there not an increasing multitude of persons in the United States who have the most exaggerated expectations of personal profit on Christmas Day? Perhaps it is not quite so bad as this, but it is safe to say that what the children alone expect to receive, in money value, would absord the national surplus about which so much fuss is made. There is really no objection to this—the terror of the surplus is a sort of nightmare in the country—except that it destroys the simplicity of the festival, and belittles small offerings that have their chief value in affection. And it points inevitably to the creation of a sort of Christmas "Trust" —the modern escape out of ruinous competition. When the expenses of annual charity becomes so great that the poor are discouraged from sharing in it, and the rich even feel it a burden, there would seem to be no way but the establishment of neighborhood "Trusts," in order to equalize both cost and distribution. Each family could buy a share according to its means, and the division on Christmas Day would create a universal satisfaction in profit sharing—that is, the rich would get as much as the poor, and the rivalry of ostentation would be quieted. Perhaps with the money question a little subdued, and the female anxieties of the festival allayed, there would be more room for the development of that sweet spirit of brotherly kindness, or all-embracing charity, which we know underlies this best festival of all the ages. Is this an old sermon? The Drawer trusts that it is, for there can be nothing new in the preaching of simplicity.—CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER in Harpers Drawer.

MINNESOTA IN BRIEF.

The young ladies of Anoka have organized a toboggan club.

A farmers' institute will be held at Currie in the near future.

W. S. Conrod will on January 1 remove his wholesale tobacco house from Stillwater to St. Paul.

The average daily attendance of pupils in the Winona schools during the past month was 1,911.

Several young men at Austin have organized the Nineteeth Century club for literary improvement.

The Moorhead Reading Room association has been organized and money has been raised to open and furnish rooms.

H. O. Buchholz, a saloonkeeper of Red Wing, was fined $54 in Justice Graham's court for selling liquor to an habitual drunkard.

Arrangements are being made for holding a grand ski tournament at Red Wing some time during January or February under the auspices of the Aurora Ski club.

Ernest Ladd, a brakeman on the St. Peter road, had his leg and foot badly crushed near the machine shops at Winona. Amputation may be necessary.

George Thompson, one of the men who went through Thielman's hardware store at St. Cloud last fall, was found guilty of grand larceny in the first degree. The jury was out about five minutes.

Adelheid Jans, adopted daughter of Michael Schneider of Marshan, aged ten years, has been committed to the reform school by justice Newell of Hastings upon a charge of vicious and incorrigible conduct.

The pole of W. H. Cowan's wagon dropped when coming down hill near Owatonna, and wagon and all went over an embankment. Cowan was seriously hurt, having his upper jaw broken in several places, and it is thought he is injured internally.

The village council of Willmar has fixed the saloon license for next year at $800, and limiting the number of saloons to four. Under a license of $500 last year seven saloons took out license, while under a $200 license for 1886 we had eleven saloons.

The members of John Ball post, G. A. R. of Winona, gave a very pleasant benefit entertainment for the benefit of Mr. Hale, one of their number, who was injured at the time of the Republican ratification here by the premature discharge of a cannon. There was a large attendance, and the affair proved a financial and social success. A feature of the evening was the bidding off of baskets for the refreshments.

Luverne suffered from a disastrous fire. The buildings were occupied as follows: H. F. Kilgore, drug store, books and stationery, loss about $3,000, partially insured; J. H. Doble; cigars and tobacco, nearly all the stock and furniture was lost; J. H. Graff, ready-made clothing, about two-thirds saved, insured for $2,000; building insured.

At a special meeting of the county commissioners of Waseca county, the bondsmen of ex-Treasurer Charles McKenna met to adjust the claims of the county against them. It is reported by several prominent citizens that this meeting was ostensibly to compromise with the bondsmen. The bondsmen are responsible for about $7,000, and the public sentiment is that they shall make it good.

The nominations sent to the senate include that of Joseph Kronenberg, Jr., who was nominated for register of the land office at Taylor's Falls, Minn., in place of Lucas K. Stanard, whose term has expired. Mr. Kronenberg comes from Sandstone, Pine county, Minn., and is backed by Hon. Dan Lockwood of Buffalo N. Y.; John F. Stone of Pine City, Minn., Edward Jackson, chairman of the county committee; James Hurley, clerk of the courts; J. D. Markham of Rush City and Congressman Edmund Rice. The pay of the office is $1,618 per annum.

Thomas Brown, the man who shot Policeman Poull at Moorhead, is in jail, although it is not generally known. Upon being taken back from Minneapolis another attempt was made by the Moorhead people to lynch him, and he was sent down there for safe keeping. A constant watch is kept over him and he is allowed no privileges whatever. He has fully recovered from his bullet wounds. His trial occurs next month, and in speaking of it, he says: "Unless I get a change of venue I guess I shall have to swing." He spoke of it as lightly as though the sentence was simply six months in jail.

There was a row in Waterville at the Hanes house that came very near having serious ending. It seems that one J. R. Youngkin, who is in the employ of the Minneapolis & St. Louis railway as a tinker of speed recorders in cabooses and as a spotter or detective for the superintendent, was playing cards with one or two others in the parlor of the hotel. Youngkin was more or less intoxicated, and at about 2 o'clock a. m. a quarrel arose over the cards and a trick, in which the most offensive language was exchanged, and Youngkin was knocked down, whereupon he drew a revolver and would no doubt have shot some one had he not been interfered with.

An explosion of metal in a furnace at the Edgar Thompson Steel works at Pittsburg, badly damaged the furnace and three men who were standing directly in front of the furnace at the time were horribly burned by the molten fluid being thrown on their bodies. They were almost roasted alive, and will in all probability, die. There names are John Sullivan, aged thirty-five; John Anderson, aged forty-two, and a young Hungarian known as Big John." The loss to property is heavy.

CONGRESSIONAL.

Weekly Resume of the Proceedings of the Senate and House.

Monday Dec. 17.

SENATE.—The Riddleberger resolution for the re-organization of the Senate came up. Riddleberger said a change was necessary, in order that the faith of the Republican party, pledged to a consideration of the British extradition treaty in open session, might be kept.

At the conclusion of his remarks, Mr. Riddleberger asked leave to withdraw the resolution, but objections were made by Mr. Harris, of Tennessee, who moved to lay it upon the table, and called the yeas and nays, after paying a high tribute to Mr. Ingall's impartially and ability. Finally the senator from Virginia was permitted to withdraw his resolution, and the incident closed.

HOUSE.—A recess will be taken from Dec. 21 to Jan. 27. Mr. Springer, on behalf of the committee on territories, moved in the house to-day to suspend the rules and adopt a resolution making the senate bill for the admission of the State of South Dakota and for the organization of the Territory of North Dakota a special order for to-morrow and from day to day until disposed of providing that the omnibus bill may be offered as a substitute therefor. Thereafter other bills relating to the admission of territories shall be disposed of in the order fixed by the committee. Mr. Cox hoped that the gentleman would be wrong in his anticipations. This was a patriotic work in which both perties could join. The motion was agreed to and the resolution adopted

Tuesday, Dec. 18.

SENATE.—The determined attitude of the Republicans in the matter of the tariff bill in the senate has given the Democrats great concern. The Democrats have discovered that the Republicans are so much in earnest that they will forego the usual vacation and sit here all through the holiday recess, holding night sessions also, in the expectation that they will be able to force the passage of the bill, by the time that congress shall reassemble. The consequence of this movement on the part of the Republicans has been that the Democrats have given private intimations that they are ready to come to some compromise, and the probability is that the agreement will be that some definite time after New Year shall be fixed for taking a final vote upon the bill. If this can be accomplished the senate will take its usual holiday recess; and that there are a good many who think that it will have the usual vacation whether an agreement of that kind can be reached or not.

HOUSE.—A decidedly spirited discussion took place in the house on the civil service commission, and a motion to wipe out the appropriation for the commission was promptly voted down.

The house committee on public lands to day ordered a favorable report on a bill to allow persons who have been compelled to abandon or relinquish their homestead carries on account of drouth or other good cause, to take out another entry in place of the abandoned claim.

Gifford's bill to open the Sioux reservation to be reported with some amendments.

Mr. Springer said that he would call a meeting of the committee on territories tomorrow to determine upon the best time for calling up the South Dakota bill. The house then took up the legislative appropriation bill and proceeded to consider it.

Wednesday Dec. 19.

SENATE:—The discussion of the tariff bill was continued.

The Democratic Senators held a caucus after adjournment and authorized Messrs. Harris and Vest to propose to Messrs. Morrill and Sherman, representing the Republican senators, a proposition embodying the following provisions: To adjourn on Friday next until Jan. 7, as fixed by the house resolution: To hold daily sessions beginning at 11 a. m., and continuing till at least 5:30 p. m., until the tariff bill is disposed of, and, finally, to vote on the tariff bill Jan. 20. This practically with the Republican proposition, save in the matter of night sessions.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate the expression of the views of congress to the governments of the countries of Europe.

Mr. Edmunds offered in the senate to-day, and had referred to the committee on resolutions, the following:

Resolved, That the government of the United States will look with serious concern and disapproval upon any connection of an European government with the construction or control of any ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien or across Central America; and must regard any connection or control injurious to the just rights and interests of the United States and as a menace to their welfare.

HOUSE.—The house committee on fisheries to-day began the investigation regarding the alleged outrages in Alaska. William Gavitt, special treasury agent to the Seal Islands, testified that the Alaska company's agents at St. George's island respected neither the laws of God nor man. Among other things he said they furnished liquor to prostitutes in an underhand manner. Witness said that the whole island was a place of prostitution from one end to the other.

Thursday, Dec. 20.

SENATE.—There is to be a Christmas vacation for both houses and the Republican tariff bill will be sent to the house before Feb. 1. The Republicans will be able to control the majority of the votes of their own number for this purpose. The house and senate agreed to-day to an adjournment of congress from to-morrow to Jan. 2.

The senate in executive session to-day confirmed all the army and navy nominations that have been sent in this session except the new staff appointments. The senate also confirmed Thomas Burke to be chief justice of Washington Territory.

HOUSE.—The Peel submitted to the house the conference report on bill for the relief and civilization on the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota. Mr. Papson said: The bill was an important one, providing, as it did, for the disposal of 4,371,000 acres of land in Minnesota. As the bill passed the house it provided that the Indians, some seven thousand in number, should be located in certain townships; that the remainder of the land should be divided into agricultural and pine lands. The agricultural lands, it was provided, should be taken under the homestead law at $1.25 per acre. The pine lands were to be appraised and sold at public auction, and not more than one tenth of such lands were to be disposed of in any one year. The opposition to the report was so bitter that the house was obliged to call in a quorum to sustain the bill, and a concurrence in the conference report was finally reached.

Friday, Dec. 21.

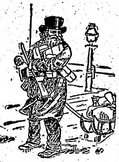
SENATE.—The following bills passed the senate: The senate bill to provide for the disposal of certain public lands of the United States under the provisions of the issue of military stores to the governor of Montana for the regular active militia; the house bill granting right of way through certain lands in Minnesota to the Moorhead, Leech Lake & Northern Railroad company.

HOUSE.—Congress adjourned to-day for the Christmas holidays and without vain regret upon either side of the chambers. Many members left for home lastnight, and all day they kept slipping away to catch trains or to engage in Christmas shopping. At 3:30 this afternoon there were a larger number of congressmen upon the street than in the house, and when the house adjourned at a little after five o'clock there was much less than a quorum present. A large number of Western congressmen will remain here during the recess. Of course all the Eastern members will go to their homes and nearly all of those living east of the Mississippi river are on their way thither. Most of them who have business will remain until somedays after the meeting of congress, but it is the general practice for members to get back here to participate in the New Year's holiday festivities. The Minnesota members will all remain here through the recess except Mr Rice.

Bear-Hunting With Lassos.

The cowboys of Northwestern Texas are becoming very proficient in lassoing bears. Around Fort Davis the "sport" is extremely popular, and a short time ago B. Q. McCutcheon, "the champion roper," after lassoing a black grizzly lead the animal quite a distance, when he met two other cowboys. They also roped the bear and McCutcheon then dismounted and killed it.

SING A SONG OF CHRISTMAS.



Sing a song of Christmas,
Pockets full of Chink;
Had to spend the whole of it,
For things to eat and drink.
Presents pouring in and out,
Merrily they skim;

HIS CHRISTMAS EVE.

BY ELLA W. BEATTIE.

It is a simple story and needs no art in the telling.

Wellington Brown said to himself that he had been "playing in devilish hard luck." Though his soliloquy did not betray the particulars, it was evident that he had a poor opinion of wine, a worse one of the world in general, and the very worst of women, by which it may be inferred that he had been having too much of all. It was only 12—an early hour for Wellington Brown—when he got to his rooms. Having done one unusual thing, he concluded to do another.

He made a resolution.

He said to himself.

"I will get out of this cursed town," and he flung his coat on a chair, turned up the gas, and hauled out his trunk with that peculiar impetuosity of which only a man is capable. He put the bureau drawers on the floor to have them handy, and sat on a camping stool to pack his trunk. Before doing this he put on his hat. This simple thing is always of great assistance to a man. Then he lit his cigarette and began. He found thirty-six neckties and twenty-nine scarfpins, and as many soiled and torn gloves as served to fill his brazen coal urn half to the top.

Someway, he wasn't a pleasant-looking object. There was something sulphurous about him, so to speak. Something more than anger showed in his face. It may have been passion, or chagrin, or revenge. But whatever it was, it made it look profane, though the face was a handsome one, firmly moulded, dark, and vivacious, and the fringe of the half-curling brown hair which showed below the unbrushed silk hat was graceful enough for an artist.

But it is certain that though an artist might have painted the features, he would never have copied the soul that showed through them. To tell this story truthfully it must be owned that between the puffs of the cigarette Mr. Brown indulged in an occasional oath. It must be said that in nine cases out of ten there was something original about the oaths. He came across a pack of photographs, and flung them with vivacious accuracy into the grate.

"Go there, my beauties, and burn," he cried. "You'll make a good blaze—and its the only good thing you'll do! You never danced faster than you do now, mademoiselle," he went on, watching a pair of white pictured arms writhe in the heat, and blow away up the chimney," "I wouldn't have had room for the neckties if I hadn't put you out," he said. There seemed to be something wrong with the cigarette, and he threw it away and lit another. Then he went on with his packing.

"If I wake at 7 I'll go to San Francisco," he said with a grin at a hideous Chinese idol that he had stowed away in the corner, "and if I wake at 8 I'll go to London."

He packed more furiously than before. Suddenly he stopped puffing.

"By jove!" said she. He lifted a little box from out a tin chest filled with papers. Then he got up and went to the grate. He lifted the lid of the box. "By jove!" said he again, and he took off his hat.

The box held some letters, and they were tied together with a pink ribbon. Wellington Brown undid the ribbon with fingers that trembled a little.

"Abst hinthe will kill a man as sure as shooting," he remarked in apology for the shaking of his hand. He looked at the date of the first letter.

"I was 18 when I wrote it," he said. "She kept them a good while. I suppose she sent them back when I got into that scrape at college, poor little girl. It's twenty years ago, easy." He glanced idly down the page of the letter, written in the boyish hand he remembered in all of his school books.

"DEAR LITTLE BLOSSOM," it began. "it is three months now since I saw you. But for my dreams, dear, I could never stand it. You wouldn't believe how hard I am working. I wrote last night till 1 o'clock. Then I sat in the window an hour and thought of you. I might well be afraid of this great city. There is a roar from it even now. But I am not afraid. I think I feel stronger than it. I might be miserable for all the sin I see here, and the suffering, but that I hope in some way I may remedy it in part. In all ages some men have had great influence, you know. I shall write books that will make the poor more helpful and the rich less proud. I read two books constantly—my Bible and my Homer. So all the men I write of will be gentle and brave. But all this is the best I get from you, dear love. Your little hand seems to lie softly in mine as I write, and leads me on to other heights.

"O, Blossom, write to me, and let me see the world as it looks through your sweet eyes, glad, merciful and redeeming.

"Yours most lovingly,
"WELLINGTON."

Mr. Brown's face was flushed. "Rot!" said he, and it followed the photographs. Yet he opened another.

"MY BEAUTIFUL LITTLE SWEETHEART," this one said, "I have grown to believe that art can only feed on prayer. I am sure that when I pray my work all day is more as you would have it be. This morning as I knelt I held your picture in my hand. My garret is so high that I can pray by the window and no one will see me. I look with open eyes, straight into heaven and see there wonders that I never did before. This morning as I knelt the sun seemed suddenly to leap up from behind two huge walls and smoke stacks and almost blinded me with its glory. Your love has filled me, wrapt me, gilded me, overpowered me, just so, dear, and in its splendor I shall ripen to something wholesome, I trust. Yours, love,
"WELLINGTON."

Mr, Brown laid this letter on a chair,

"What a blooming young idiot I must have been," he said. He opened another.

"MY OWN GIRL: "I have been wondering to-night how men grow old and hard! It must surely be because they have no Christ and no sweet Blossom! O, dear me, when I remember your soft hair, your lovely eyes, your true red lips, your tender voice, I am in ecstasy! And when I think of Christ—by the way, dear, do you know, I think the churches have spoiled Christ for so many of us. Do you know, He seems so fascinating to me—chivalrous, gentle, brave, humorous, affectionate, appreciative, satirical, friendly—everything in short that can give a man strong individuality. How original He was! How poetical! O Blossom, pray for me that some faint reflex of His glory may fall on me. I am writing day and night, love. Some day perhaps you will be proud of me. Adieu, little one. God bless you. I am frightfully lonely, and do not know a soul in town. As ever,
W."

When Mr. Brown had finished, he dropped his head on his hand.

"Good God!" he said. "Good God!" He sat a long time so and then he took up another letter.

"O, My Sweet. Can it be true? Is Fate so kind? Have you heard; can you guess? I am rich, dear; rich. It has come about in the oddest way! It is like a leaf from a romance. The mines that I told you about that father—but never mind the particulars. I will come down myself and tell it to you between kisses. Now all of our dreams will be realized I will take a finishing course at college, travel about a bit, and by that time you will be through school and old enough to be my wife. O love, love, love! Then, wherever we go, shall we not make someone happier and better. There is so much to do, so many sophistries to kill, so many men and woman to help—alas, so many to fight. But we will not die as others die and leave the world no better! I will be with you, dear, before you have written an answer to this wild letter.
Your own W. B."

LIFE OR DEATH.

The man whose initials signed that letter got up and staggered to the mirror. His eyes were bloodstot, the lines about his mouth sensuous and selfish.

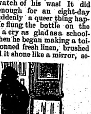
"I haven't a friend in the world," he said. He stood and looked at himself as if he were confronting some stranger.

"Why should I go away? There is no place that I care to see—London, Paris, Vienna, Petersburg, New York, New Orleans? I'm tired. I haven't a friend in the world, not even a dog that will lick my hand. Africa, Brazil, the mountains, Sierras, Alps, Japan, Florida, Mexico? There is nothing but husks! I cannot escape from myself. That I had wings like——" He went to the closet. There was a good many bottles on the shelf. "I might get drunk," he said, with a savage laugh. But he took down a bottle of morphine.

IT'S DEATH.

"There's enough, he said, with satisfaction; "and, by Jove, it's the quickest way. There's not a soul to mind." He raised it carelessly to his lips and kept it there. Heavens, what a terror that watch of his was! It did beating enough for an eight-day clock. Suddenly a queer thing happened. He flung the bottle on the floor with a cry as glad as a schoolboy's. Then he began making a toilet. He donned fresh linen, brushed his hat till it shone like a mirror, selected the newest of the thirty-five ties, found fresh gloves. He whistled as he did it. Once he wept. Once he seemed to pray. Then he fell to whistling again. 'Twas a strain from French operetta. But what did that matter? He was not swearing. He packed a valise. Then he got a paper and looked through it with impatience. At length he found what he wanted. He consulted his watch.

ON THE SPIT.



TURKEY STUFFING.

"The chop house keeps open all night," he said, and he seized the valise and rushed out. The church bells were ringing. "It's not Sunday," he said, puzzled. "No, but it's Christmas, by all that's curious!" He sat in the chop house an hour, and ate with an honest appetite that he had long been a stranger to. Then he called a cab. An hour later he was past the last suggestion of a city, flying westward over the prairie.

The little dressmaker had been invited out to dinner, and that was the reason she had on her nut brown silk. 'Twas the day after Christmas and the town folk were making the most of it. The dressmaker had some bitter-sweet in her hair—charming hair with streaks of gray. They were premature streaks, for her face was smooth and youthful though so pale—a delicate face with eyes as soft as a dove's. It was a quiet face, with an expression that reminded one of the dead-calm of a midsummer sea. Such a calm stirs the heart as much as a storm.

It was a curious room that the little dressmaker sat in, It was long and narrow, with a hammock hung low across one end. The floor was of dark polished wood with a rug or two. There were only two pictures on the walls. One was a sketch of the sea painted by a masterly hand. The freedom of the sea was in it, the waves leaped gladly over one another, the wind seemed to be rushing over it. The other was a flight of birds straight up into the blue sky of the morning. There were no tidies, no ribbons, nothing to mark the room a woman's, yet the little dressmaker sat in it before the fireplace and looked about it lovingly—at her books, her marble Mercury above the fire, at the quaint carved table at her side.

There was a knock at the door.

The little dressmaker got up a little startled. It was certainly a very rude knock.

She waited two seconds. A man entered without invitation,

The little dressmaker looked at him affrighted.

"Blossom," he said. She went back to the fireplace and sat down giddily. He took off his coat and hat and flung them in the hammock.

The little dressmaker did not go out to dinner.

THE YEAR 1889.

Centennial Celebration of the Organization of the Catholic Church in America.

The year 1889 is the centenary year of the Catholic Church as an organized body in the United States. Nov. 6, 1789, the American hierarchy was founded by the creation of the bishopric of Baltimore and the appointment thereto of the Rt. Rev. John Carrol. S. J. The centenary of that event will be magnificently celebrated in Baltimore. But earlier in the year comes another centenary, that of Georgetown College of the Jesuits. It will be honored with a three day's celebration, beginning Feb. 20 and closing on Washington's birthday. There is a peculiar fitness in this coincidence of dates. for Washington was a devoted friend of Georgetown college and his interest in it was handed down in his family for four generations.

Two of his grand nephews, Augustine and Bushrod Washington, were students there in 1793; George, son of the younger Bushrod, in 1830; and Henry, son of Lawrence Washington, of Virginia in 1834. The Jesuits had an earlier American school than Georgetown, the first indeed, of which we have record in the English colonies of America. It was at the junction of the Great and Little Bohemian river, was called Bohemia academy. One of their first pupils was John Carrol, afterward first bishop of Baltimore.

Cardinal Gibbons, ninth in succession from its pioneer bishop in the see of Baltimore, will preside at Georgetown's centenary, and as large a representation as possible of the American episcopate and priesthood will gather at that place of hallowed memories to rejoice with the Society of Jesus that has given to the American church its first bishop and countless other blessings.

A Christmas Story of Father Drumgoole.

The "Round Table" of the Buffalo, N. Y., Courier, recently gave this pleasant item: Somebody is constantly making presents to Bishop Ryan. Lately they have given him Judge Hammond's house in Niagara square for newsboy's home. Speaking of newsboys' homes, a gentleman tells this story of Father Drumgoole's mission in New York. The occasion was a Christmas dinner to the newsboys and street arabs of the city. "Why," said he to the good, cheery father, "that is no newsboy," pointing to a gray-haired man eating turkey. "No," said he, "he is one of God's children though, and is sick and in trouble and a Protestant, so we made him welcome."

A CHRISTMAS CAROL.

"Merry Christmas!"—ring it out
All ye happy festal bells,
Through the sweet magnolia groves,
Frozen moors, or snow-heaped fells.
Carols rise, and yule-fires glow,
Sprays of silver mistletoe
Shine from out the dark-green pine,
Yule-tide, peace and joy be thine!
"Blessed Christmas!"—ring it out,
All ye tuneful festal bells,
Unto cheerless hearts, wherein
Neither hope nor gladness dwells.
Heaven smile, and stars shine out
All our yule-decked homes about;
Angels stand within the door—
Christmas-tide is come once more!

He Saved the Frame.

A well-known showman who once ran a newspaper in a Pensylvania town tells a story which will amuse the printers. He hired a big colored person to do chores about the office, and on one occasion directed him to move a form from one place to the other. The darkey promptly put it on his head, and just as promptly his head went through, and there was a terrible mess of pi. To his employer he thus reported: "Boss, I done spilled the type, but saved the frame."

Charles Hutchins, of McCaulleyville, Minn., committed suicide by taking laudanum. Mr. Hutchins was among the early pioneers, having gone to Fort Abercrombie in the sixties, as blacksmith for the soldiers then stationed there. A few years ago he moved across the river to McCaulleyville. Deceased was the father of Sarah Hutchins, who recently committed suicide near Aberdeen.

Officer Bryan of Paragould, Arkansas, was detailed to serve a warrant on John Williams, who was charged with selling liquor contrary to the county law. Williams was discovered by the officers disguised as a negro. Williams resisted arrest, and during a running fire succeeded in mortally wounding Officer Bryan and his two assistants. Williams was also wounded and will probably die.

We suspect that few, who hang their Ayer's Almanac on its accustomed nail, from year to year, are aware that from thirteen to fourteen million copies of this popular calendar are printed every year. To accomplish this stupendous work, the publishers use a machine which prints and folds, ready for the binder, a hundred thousand almanacs daily, turning off at the rate of a hundred and eighty books a minute, and consuming about twenty-five miles of paper each day! These astounding facts and figures are given in the preface to a neat volume containing specimen copies of the Almanacs and other publications of this company in twenty-one languages. This book, will, no doubt, be appreciated by many as a rare literary curiosity while it must increase the demand for Dr. Ayer's famous Sarsaparilla and other standard remedies. Your druggist can now supply you with Ayer's Almanac for 1889 in its usual attractive form.

SHADOW OF SIN.

What Dr. Talmage has to Say about the Men in Egypt Who Made Bricks.

BROOKLYN, Dec. 16.—The Rev. T. De Witt Talmage's discourse to-day was entitled, "Lifted from the Brick-kilns." His text was: "Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold."—Psalms 68:13. He said:

I suppose you know what the Israelites did down in Egyptian slavery. They made bricks. Amid the utensils of the brick-kiln there were also other utensils of cookery—the kettles, the pots, the pans, with which they prepared their daily food—and when these poor slaves, tired of the day's work, lay down to rest, they lay down amid the implements of hard work. When they arose in the morning they found their garments covered with the clay and the smoke and the dust, and besmirched and begrimed with the utensils of cookery. But after a while the Lord broke up that slavery, and He took these poor slaves into a land where they had better garb, bright and clean and beautiful apparel. No more bricks for them to make. Let Pharaoh make his own bricks. When David in my text comes to describe the transition of these poor Israelites from their bondage amid the brick-kilns into the glorious emancipation for which God had prepared them, he says: "Though ye have lain among the pots,' yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold."

Miss Whately, the author of a celebrated book, "Life in Egypt," said she sometimes saw people in the East cooking their food on the tops of houses and that she had often seen, just before sundown, pigeons, doves, which had during the heat of the day been hiding among the kettles and the pans with which the food was prepared, picking up the crumbs that they might find—just about the hour of sunset would spread their wings and fly heavenward, entirely unsoiled by the region in which they had moved, for the pigeon is a very cleanly bird. And as the pigeons fly away the setting sun would throw silver on their wings and gold on their breasts. So you see it was not a far-fetched simile, or an unnatural comparison, when David in my text says to these emancipated Israelites, and says to all those who are brought out of any kind of trouble into any kind of spirtual joy: "Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold.

Sin is the hardest of all taskmakers. Worse than Pharaoh, it keeps us trudging, trudging in a most degrading service; but after a while Christ comes, and he says, "Let my people go," and we pass out from among the brick-kilns of sin into the glorious liberty of the gospel; we put on the clean robes of a Christian profession, and when at last we soar away to the warm nest which God has provided for us in heaven, we shall go fairer than a dove, its wings covered with silver, and its feathers covered with yellow gold.

I am going to preach something which some of you do not believe, and that is that the grandest possible adornment is the religion of Jesus Christ. There are a great many people who suppose that religion is a very different thing from what it really is. The reason men condemn the Bible is because they do not understand the Bible; they have not properly examined it. Dr. Johnson said that Hume told a minister in the bishopric of Durham that he had never particularly examined the New Testament, yet all his life warring against it. Halley, the astronomer, announced his skepticism to Sir Isaac Newton, and Sir Isaac Newton said: "Now, sir, I have examined the subject and you have not, and I am ashamed that you, professing to be a philosopher, consent to condemn a thing you have never examined." And so men reject the religion of Jesus Christ because they really have never investigated it. They think it something unattractive, something that will not work, something Pecksniffian, something hypocritical, something repulsive, when it is so bright and so beautiful you might compare it to a chaffinch, you might compare it to a robin redbreast, you might compare it to a dove, its wings covered with silver, and its feathers with yellow gold.

But how is it if a young man becomes a Christian? All through the club-rooms where he associates, all through the business circles where he is known, there is commiseration. They say: "What a pity that a young man who had such bright prospects should so have been despoiled by those Christians, giving up all his wordly prospects for something which is of no particular present worth!" Here is a young woman who becomes a Christian, her voice, her face, her manners the charm of the drawing-room. Now all through the fashionable circles the whisper goes: "What a pity that such a bright light should have been extinguished, that such a graceful gait should be crippled, that such wordly prospects should be obliterated!" Ah, my friends, it can be shown that religion's ways are ways of pleasantness and that all her paths are peace; that religion, instead of being dark, and doleful, and lachrymose, and repulsive, is bright and beautiful, fairer than a dove its wings covered with silver and its feathers with yellow gold.

See, in the first place, what religion will do for a man's heart. I care not how cheerful a man may naturally be before conversion, conversion brings him up to a higher standard of cheerfulness. I do not say he will laugh any louder, I do not say he may stand back from some forms of hilarity in which he once indulged; but there comes into his soul an immense satisfaction. A young man not a Christian, depends upon worldly success to keep his spirits up. Now he is prospered, now he has large salary, now he has beautiful wardrobe, now he has pleasant friends, now he has more money than he knows how to spend; everything goes bright and well with him. But trouble comes—there are many young men in the house this morning who can testify out of their own experience that sometimes to young men trouble does come—his friends are gone, his salary is gone, his health is gone; goes down, down. He becomes sour, cross, queer, misanthropic, blames the world, blames society, blames the church, blames everything, rushes perhaps to the intoxicating cup to drown his trouble; but instead of drowning his trouble drowns his body and drowns his soul.

But here is a Christian young man. Trouble comes to him. Does he give up? No. He throws himself back on the resources of heaven. He says: "God is my father. Out of all these disasters I shall pluck advantage for my soul. All the promises are mine, Christ is mine, Christian companionship is mine, heaven is mine. What though my apparel be worn out? Christ gives me a robe of righteousness. What though my money be gone? I have a title deed to the whole universe in the promise. 'All are yours.' What, though my worldly friends fall away? Ministering angels are my bodyguard. What though my fare be poor and my bread be scant? I sit at the King's banquet."

Oh, what a poor, shallow stream is worldly enjoyment compared with the deep, broad overflowing river of God's peace, rolling midway in the Christian heart! Sometimes you have gone out on the iron-bound beach of the sea when there has been a storm on the ocean, and you have seen the waves dash out into white foam at your feet. They did not do you any harm. While there, you thought of the chapter written by the Psalmist, and perhaps you recited it to yourself while the storm was making commentary upon the passage: "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in time of trouble. Therefore will I not fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. Selah!" Oh, how independent the religion of Christ makes a man of worldly success and worldly circumstances! Nelson, the night before his last battle, said: "Tomorrow I shall win either a peerage or a grave in Westminster Abbey." And it does not make much difference to the Christian whether he rises or falls in worldly matters; he has everlasting renown any way. Other plumage may be thrown to the blast, but that soul adorned with Christian grace is fairer than the dove its wings covered with silver and its feathers with yellow gold.

You and I have found out that people who pretend to be happy are not always happy. Look at that young man caricaturing the Christian religion, scoffing at everything good, going into roystering drunkenness, dashing the champagne bottle to the floor, rolling the glasses from the barroom counter, laughing, shouting, stamping the floor, shrieking. Is he happy? I will go to his midnight pillow. I will see him turn the gas off. I will ask myself if the pillow on which he sleeps is as soft as the pillow on which that pure young man sleeps. Ah! no. When he opens his eyes in the morning will the world be as bright to him as to that young man who retired at night saying his prayers, invoking God's blessing upon his own soul and the souls of his comrades, and father and mother and brother and sister far away? No, no. His laughter will ring out from the saloon so that you hear it as you pass by; but it is hollow laughter; in it is the snapping of heart-strings and the rattle of prison gates. Happy! That young man happy? Let him fill high the bowl; he cannot drown an upbraiding conscience. Let the balls roll through the bowling alley; the deep rumble and the sharp crack cannot overpower the voices of condemnation. Let him whirl in the dance of sin and temptation and death. All the brilliancy of the scene cannot make him forget the last look of his mother, as he left home, when she said to him: "Now, My son, you will do right, I am sure you will do right; you will, won't you?" That young man happy? Why, across every night there flit shadows of eternal darkness; there are adders coiled up in every cup; there are vultures of despair striking their iron beak into his heart; there are skeleton fingers of grief pinching at the throat. I come in amid the clicking of the glasses and under the flashing of the chandeliers, and I cry: "Woe! woe! The way of the ungodly shall perish. There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked. The way of transgressors is hard." Oh, my friends, there is much more joy in one drop of Christian satisfaction than the whole rivers of sinful delight. Other wings may be drenched of the storm and splashed of the tempest, but the dove that comes in through the window of this heavenly ark has wings like the dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold.

Again I remark, religion is an adornment in the style of usefulness into which it inducts a man. Here are two young men. The one has fine culture, exquisite wardrobe, plenty of friends, great worldly success, but he lives for himself. His chief care is for his own comfort. He lives uselessly. He dies unregretted. Here is another young man. His apparel may not be so good, his education may not be so thorough. He lives for others. His happiness is to make others happy. He is as self-denying as that dying soldier falling in the ranks, when he said: "Colonel, there is no need of those boys tiring themselves by carrying me to the hospital; let me die where I am." So this young man of whom I speak loves God, wants all the world to love Him, is not ashamed to carry a bundle of clothes up that dark alley to the poor. Which of those young men do you admire the better? The one a sham, the other a prince imperial.

Oh, do you know of anything, my hearer, that is more beautiful than to see a young man start out for Christ? Here is some one falling; he lifts him up. Here is a vagabond boy; he introduces him to a mission school. Here is a family freezing to death; he carries them a scuttle of coal. There are eight hundred millions perishing in midnight heathen darkness; by all possible means he tries to send them the gospel. He may be laughed at, and he may be sneered at, and he may be caricatured, but he is not ashamed to go every where, saying; "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ. It is the power of God and the wisdom of God unto salvation." Such a young man can go through everything. There is no force on earth or in hell that can resist him.

I show you three spectacles. Spectacle the first: Napoleon passes by with the host that went down with him to Egypt, and up with him through Russia, and crossed the continent on the bleeding heart of which he set his iron heel, and across the quivering flesh of which he went grinding the wheels of his gun-carriages—in his dying moment asking his attendants to put on his military boots for him.

Spectacle the second; Voltaire, bright and learned and witty and eloquent, with tongue and voice and stratagem infernal, warring against God and poisoning whole kingdoms with his infidelity, yet applauded by the clapping hands of thrones and empires and continents—his last words, in delirium supposing Christ standing by the bedside—his last words; "Crush that wretch!"

Spectacle the third: Paul—Paul insignificant in person, thrust out from all refined association, scourged, spat on, hounded like a wild beast from city to city, yet trying to make the world good and heaven full; announcing resurrection to those who mourned at the barred gates of the dead: speaking consolations which light up the eyes of widowhood and orphanage and want with glow of certain and eternal release; undaunted before those who could take his life, his cheek flushed with transport, and his eye on heaven; with one hand shaking defiance at all the foes on earth and all the principalities of hell, and with the other hand beckoning messenger angels to come and bear him away, as he says: "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand; I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept my faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give me."

Which of the three spectacles do you most admire? When the wind of death struck the conqueror and the infidel they were tossed like sea-gulls in a tempest, drenched of the wave and torn of the hurricane, their dismal voices heard through the everlasting storm but when the wave and the wind of death struck Paul, like an albatross, he made a throne of the tempest, and one day floated away into the calm, clear summer of Heaven, brighter than the dove, its wings covered with silver, and its feathers with yellow gold. Oh, are you not in love with such a religion—a religion that can do much for a man while he lives, and so much for man when he comes to die? I suppose you may have noticed the contrast between the departure of a Christian and the departure of an infidel. Deodorous, dying in chagrin because he could not compose a joke equal to the joke uttered at the other end of his table. Zeuxis, dying in a fit of laughter at the sketch of an aged woman—a sketch made by his own hand. Mazarin, dying playing cards, his friends holding his hands because he was unable to hold them himself. All that on one side, compared to the departure of the Scotch minister, who said to his friends: "I have no interest as to whether I live or die; if I die I shall be with the Lord, and if I live the Lord shall be with me." Or the last words of Washington: "It is well." Or the last words of McIntosh, the learned and the great: "Happy!" Or the last word of Hannah More, the poetess: "Joy!" Or those thousands of Christians who have gone, saying: "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." "O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory? "Behold the contrast. Behold the charm of the one, behold the darkness of the other. Now, I know it is very popular in this day for young men to think there is something more charming in skepticism than in religion. They are ashamed of the old-fashioned religion of the cross, and they pride themselves on their free thinking on all these subjects. My young friends, I want to tell you what I know from observation that while skepticism is a beautiful land at the start, it is the great Sahara desert at the last.

Years ago a minister's son went off from home to college. At college he formed the acquaintance of a young man whom I shall call Ellison. Ellison was an infidel. Ellison scoffed at religion, and the minister's son soon learned from him the infidelity, and when he went home on his vacation broke his father's heart by his denunciation of Christianity. Time passed on and vacation came, and the minister's son went off to spend the vacation, and was on a journey and came to a hotel. The hotel keeper said: "I am sorry that tonight I shall have to put you in a room adjoining one where there is a very sick and dying man. I can give you no other accommodation." "Oh," said the young college student and minister's son, "that will make no difference to me except the matter of sympathy with anybody that is suffering." The young man retired to his room but could not sleep. All night long he heard the groaning of the sick man, of the step of the watchers, and his soul trembled. He thought to himself: "Now, there is only a thin wall between me and a departing spirit. How if Ellison should know how I feel? How if Ellison should find out how my heart flutters? What would Ellison say if he knew my skepticism gave way?" He slept not. In the morning, coming down, he said to the hotelkeeper: "How is the sick man?" "Oh," said the hotel keeper, "he is dead, poor fellow! The doctors told us he could not last through the night." "Well," said the young man, "what was the sick one's name; where is he from?" "Well," said the hotel-keeper, "he is from Providence College." "Providence College! What is his name?" "Ellison." "Ellison!" Oh, how the young man was stunned! It was his old college mate—dead without any hope. It was many hours before the young man could leave the hotel. He got on his horse and started homeward, and all the way he heard something saying to him: "Dead! Lost! Dead! Lost!" He came to no satisfaction until he entered the Christian life, until he entered the Christian ministry, until he became one of the most eminent missionaries of the cross, the greatest Baptist missionary the world has ever seen since the days of Paul—no superior to Adoniram Judson. Which do you like the best, Judson's skepticism or Judson's Christian life? Judson's suffering for Christ's sake, Judson's almost martyrdom? Oh, young man, take your choice between these two kinds of lives. Your own heart tells you this morning the Christian life is more admirable, more peaceful, more comfortable and more beautiful.

Oh, if religion does so much for a man on earth, what will it do for him in heaven? That is the thought that comes to me now. If a soldier can afford to shout "Huzza!" when he goes into battle, how much more jubilantly he can afford to shout "Huzza!" when he has gained the victory! If religion is so good a thing to have here, how bright a thing it will be in heaven; I want to see that young man when the glories of heaven have robed and crowned him. I want to hear him sing when all huskiness of earthly colds is gone, and he rises up with the great doxology. I want to know what standard he will carry when marching under arches of pearl in the army of banners. I want to know what company he will keep in a land where there are all kings and queens forever and ever. If I have induced one of you this morning to begin a better life, then I want to know it. I may not in this world clasp hands with you in friendship, I may not hear from your own lips the story of temptation and sorrow, but I will clasp hands with you when the sea is passed and the gates are entered.

That I might woo you to a better life, and that I might show you the glories with which God clothes His dear children in heaven, I wish I could this morning swing back one of the twelve gates that there might dash upon your ear one shout of the triumph, that there might flame upon your eyes one blaze of the splendor. Oh, when I speak of that good land you involuntarily think of some one there that you loved—father, mother, brother, sister, or dear little child garnered already. You want to know what they are doing this morning. I will tell you what they are doing. Singing. You want to know what they wear. Coronets of triumph. You wonder why oft they look to the gates of the temple, and watch and wait. I will tell you why they watch and wait and look to the gate of the temple. For your coming. I shout upward the news today, for I am sure some of you will repent and start for heaven. Oh, ye bright ones before the throne, your earthly friends are coming. Angels, posing mid-air, cry up the name. Gate-keeper of heaven, send forward the tidings. Watchman on the battlements celestial, throw the signal.

"Oh," you say, "religion I am going to have; it is only a question of time." My brother, I am afraid that you may lose heaven the way Louis Phillippe lost his empire. The Parisian mob came around the Tuileries. The national guard stood in defense of the palace, the commander said to Louis Philippe; "Shall I fire now? Shall I order the troops to fire? With one volley we can clear the place." "No," said Louis Phillippe, "not yet." A few minutes passed on, and then Louis Phillippe, seeing the case was hopeless, said to the general: "Now is the time to fire." "No," said the general, "it is too late now; don't you see that the soldiers are exchanging arms with the citizens? It is too late." Down went the throne of Louis Phillippe. Away from the earth went the House of Orleans, and all because the king said: "Not yet, not yet." May God forbid that any of you should adjourn this great subject of religion, and should postpone assailing your spritual foes until it is too late—too late, you losing a throne in heaven the way that Louis Phillippe lost a throne on earth.

"When the Judge descends in might,
Clothed in majesty and light;
When the earth shall quake with fear,
Where, O where, wilt thou appear?"

His Seven Turkeys.

It is not often that a huntsman, however good, kills seven turkeys before getting out of bed, says the San Francisco Examiner. However, W. E. Beach, an old frontiersman, now stopping at the American Exchange, tells how he once did it.

"I was camping," said he, last night, "at the head of the Casa Grande, in Chihuhua. There were five or six in our party, and the Indians were giving us a good deal of trouble. I woke up in the early morning, and, hearing some wild squawks, looked across the canyon on the edge of the shelving rock. There were, perhaps, a hundred fine, bronze, wild turkeys there. Fat and in elegant condition as they were, I wanted some for breakfast, and reaching for my rifle, which was at hand, I began picking them off. I kept this up till I got seven of them. The turkeys didn't fly for a good while. They took their time about it, and seemed unused to being shot at. But you ought to have seen the skirmishing among the men when I first pulled the trigger. They thought a band of Apaches were among us.

"I spoke of these as bronze turkeys. That's what they are. The hot climate of Mexico gives them this bronze color. The seven I killed were magnificent, great birds, and we had such a feast up there in the head of the Casa Grande as has not been surpassed elsewhere."

Made to Hug.

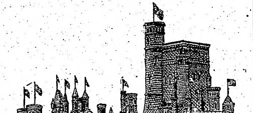
Did you ever notice how women hug themselves in cloaks and shawls? I first realized that feminine peculiarity one evening at a fashionable concert. The lobby was crowded by the arriving ladies and gentlemen, the former mostly in new opera wraps. I noticed that nearly all were hugging themselves unconsciously but fondly. I found I was doing so myself. The wraps were generally drawn forward until they were tense and comforting around the waist and shoulders, and then the hands of the wearers were caressingly held on their own opposite fore-arms or were in some way instinctively fondling the owner. All through the performance I investigated my new discovery. On every side were ocular evidences of woman's born desire to be lovingly petted. They were holding their own arms, squeezing themselves with their own elbows, pressing their hearts with their own soft biceps and in all these unconscious indulgences they were demonstrating that woman was made to hug.—Clara Belle.

Strange Objects Cast Up by the Sea.

Since the storm recently many strange shells and curiosities have been found on the beach at Sea Isle City, the most curious find being made by J. Frank Heilman. It was a piece of bone, apparently the rib of some gigantic animal. It is four and one-half feet long, nine inches thick, and weighs over thirty pounds. Chief Marshal Lewis Steinmeyer found the skull of a bird on the beach, which for size will eclipse anything to be found in the American fauna. The latter will be sent to the Smithsonian institution for examination.—Philadelphia Press.

THE SAINT PAUL WINTER CARNIVAL.

January 23 to February 1.



ST. PAUL ICE PALACE OF 1889.

The ice palaces of 1887 and 1888 linger in the memories of those who witnessed their glory as pleasant fancy like visions of the past. None can forget the triumph, the sense of personal ownership, experienced when the first ice palace stood complete more beautiful than in their wildest dreams the projectors had ever dared to anticipate. Sydenham has its crystal palace, but attractions thereof pale into insignificance before the rainbow-like perfection of the Ice King's abode. It is however, with the coming carnival rather than those that are past that St. Paul has to deal at present.

DESCRIPTION OF THE PALACE.

The location of the St. Paul Ice Palace, on the sands of the west bank of the Mississippi above Wabasha street bridge will bring it to a popularity greater than the preceding palaces have had, for it will be easier of approach than if in Central Park, will not be hidden by buildings, and can be seen for miles from the banks and bluffs of the valley and the terraced hills behind them.

This level stretches along the river some 1,200 feet and is 450 feet in width at the site of the palace, which is some 300 feet above Wabasha bridge and 50 feet from the bank of the first piteau.

The inclosing walls of the palace are 38 feet high, including the battered foundation wall 18 feet high, and the machicolutions on the summit. Over the portals and elsewhere parts of the wall are carried higher. Turrets or towers strengthen nearly every angle of the structure. The main front is toward the structure. The main front is toward the southwest, and the portal thereof is approached by a bridge 30 feet broad carried 14 feet above the sands on three arches of 21 feet span, under which storming parties or processions may pass. The bridge is guarded with a gateway with flanking towers 84 feet high and a curtain wall 30 feet high from the bridge floor, which is level with the first plateau and 14 feet above the floors of the palace. Passing through the main portal from the bridge, grand stairways sweep down to the right and left to the floor of the reception hall 56x90 feet in size. From this an archway leads out under the stairs and portal to the first archway of the bridge. From this hall the eye looks to the northwest down a "vista" 130 feet long with arcades of ice on either side and an arched ceiling of pine boughs frosted with natural jewels. At the northeast of the reception hall the main tower rises 40 feet square to a height of 112 feet, and at one angle of the tower a stair turret 20 feet in diameter rises 132 feet. Within the tower is the room of Borealis Rex, with the throne on a dais reaching back into a domed semi-circular niche or apse.

The northerly quarter of the palace is taken up by the grand hall, 116 feet wide and 150 feet long, the arcade of one end opens to the vista; the opposite end (toward Wabasha bridge) has a representation of a polar scene, partly of ice and snow, but chiefly pictorial upon a canvass 56 feet long and 16 high. Behind this, electric lamps will cause auroral effects of light and color to be thrown upon the canvass. At one side of this hall is an octagonal tower 28 feet in diameter and 64 feet high, the lower portion being arcaded and fitted as a band stand, the upper part as a balcony from which a full view of the room and contents may be enjoyed.

Passing across the vista a smaller hall is found 50x88 feet with a western portal.

Returning to the reception hall the maze may be entered. This is octagonal, 100 feet in diameter and occupied by walls and devious passages between them. To him who finds the secret of the maze a broad stair appears leading up to a balcony 10 feet wide and 90 feet long and affording open proceedings in the three halls.

The palace is 75,000 square feet in area, 148 feet long, 216 feet wide, exclusive of bridge and gate towers, which are 90 feet, or a total of 306 feet from the gate towers on the plateau to the portal on the river front.

The construction will require 11,000 tons of ice, a bulk equal to that of a wall 1 foot thick, 8 feet high and 9 miles long.

FEATURES OF THE PROGRAMME.

It has already been decided to have a Montana and Dakota day. The street parades will be made a special feature of the carnival, and for them floats about fifteen by twenty-five feet in size will be designed for each of the Northwestern states and territories, which will be emblematic of their peculiar resources. In a general way, the Minnesota float will represent agriculture and stock raising, Wisconsin, lumbering; Dakota, agriculture. Montana, mining; Oregon, fruit, and Washington, shipbuilding. St Paul will be represented by a goddess reaching out her hands to all. The street illumination will be done entirely by arc electric lights. The gas pipe used formerly upon the streets will be placed on Robert street bridge, and all the colored globes will be massed there. Evergreen decorations of various kinds will take the place of the lights on Third street, and will also be placed along Seventh street and on the corners in other parts of the city. Mr. Van Slyke will exercise his talents as a designer by getting up a Polar bear to be constructed of incandescent electric lamps, to be put on the truss-work of the bridge. The same general plan of the ice king, fire king and the two assaults or stormings that has prevailed in the past will be again followed. The fireworks used in the stormings will be more numerous, and the set pieces more elaborate and on a larger scale than ever before.

The Panama Canal Collapse.

A notable result of the Panama canal collapse is that both in Paris and in the provinces all the anger and disappointment of the investors is directed against parliament, while sympathy is extended to M. de Lesseps. Both M. de Lesseps and M. de Normandie daily receive numerous letters from holders of Panama shares and bonds encouraging them with assurances and promises that every possible sacrifice will be made to save the enterprise. Nowhere is there heard a word of complaint against M. de Lesseps, who is rather regarded as a martyr. On the other hand, there is every indication that when the deputies who voted against the bill come forward for reelection they will find a very intense feeling against them. The feeling on the bourse is less gloomy. There was a general rise in prices, Panama canal shares advancing 12 francs, Rio Tintos 11 francs and Suez canal 6 francs. The cabinet has decided that when the committee's report on the bankruptcy bill is presented to the senate, the president of that body shall ask leave to interrupt the budget debate in order to detach from the bankruptcy bill an article applicable to the position of the Panama Canal company, the object being to save it from bankruptcy. It is expected that at the opening of the next session Premier Floquet will communicate to parliament the decision of the government to restore the old system of voting, which is supported by the whole cabinet, with the exception of M. Goblet.

Less than two weeks ago Postmaster Sierstadt of Rudd, Iowa, disappeared, and although his bondsmen have diligently searched he can nowhere be found. Now William Tomes, deputy postmaster at Hampton has disappeared, and his much-interested bondsmen are anxious to learn his whereabouts. He left the city several days ago, and the inspector who is now examining the affairs of the office has found a shortage of about $1,500.

Another Dakota Convention.

The Democratic statehood convention met at Mitchell with Bartlett Tripp as chairman and James Frendenfeld of Aurora secretary. Delegates were present from the following counties:

Jerauld, Yankton, Sanborn, Sully, Faulk, Potter, Hughes, Moody, Hyde, Turner, Davison, Aurora, Minnehaha, Buffalo, Beadle, Union, Spink, Brookings, Hanson, Brule, McCook.

Telegrams of sympathy with the object of the gathering were received from Hand and Codington county Democrats. Among the notables present were:

Chief Justice Tripp, Adjt. Gen. Harden, Surveyor General Taylor, Commissioner McClure, Receiver Miller of Huron, Postmaster Miller of Pierre, Revenue Collector Nave, Maj. Barretts of Aberdeen, Editor Huntley of Huron, Col. Jeffries, of the governor's staff, from Highmore, Postmaster Love of Huron, Editor Chaffee of Vermillion, J. B. Creelman, of the New York Herald.

The following memorial was adopted:

To the Congress of the United States: Your memorialists, citizens of South Dakota, in affiliation with the Democratic party, duly assembled in convention at Mitchell this 20th day of December, 1888, hereby request, urge and solicit at the hands of your honorable body the division of the territory of Dakota upon the seventh standard parallel of surveys thereof, and the immediate admission into the Union of states of the portion of said territory lying south of said parallel of surveys. We desire most respectfully to represent that the division of the territory by an east and west line has for many years been desired and expected by its citizens; that the congress of the United States has been memorialized to that end, but without avail, by sixteen successive legislative assemblies; that in view of such expectancy the penal, charitable and educational institutions of the territory have been duplicated in the North and in the South; that religious sects have in like manner established Northern and Southern bishoprics; and that, anticipating division throughout these years intervening since the first settlement of the territory, all hope has been guided and all interests builded to that end. We desire further to represent that either section of the divided territory would be exceeded in size by but eight out of the thirty-eight states in the Union, the smaller portion comprising 74,000 square miles in excess of the mean average of all existing states; that the southern half for which immediate admission is now requested, contains within a restricted compass doubtless the most prolific mineral section within the national boundaries, producing gold, silver, copper, iron, galena, tin, nickle, graphite, mica, gypsum, coal, antimony asbestos, cobalt, salt and oil, while the larger area of prairie, remarkable productive in soil and almost entirely cultivatable by reason of the absence of hills, mountains, swamps and other obstructions to profitable agriculture, constitute a fair estimate upon which may safely be predicted for the future unusual density of population: that the people of South Dakota now number 375,000, and thus equipped their rights, interests and future welfare will be enhanced, their sense of patriotism exalted, full citizenship realized and the fundamental right of self government guaranteed by a speedy admission of sisterhood into the states. We desire further and finally to represent that the constitution for proposed state of South Dakota framed in 1885 under authority of territorial legislature by the constitutional convention, non-partisan in character, and subsequently adopted by the people at the popular election, is deemed by your memorialists a wise, safe and conservative charter of government, and that in its limitation of the public debt, its restriction in official salaries and rigidness of official requirements it is in a fair degree commendable and favorable to democratic policy. We therefore respectfully ask that your honorable body adopt some measure which shall accomplish the division of the territory on the seventh standard parallel, and the admission of the south half into the Union during the present session of congress.

Discussion arose on the resolutions between Huron and Pierre capital advocates, the latter claiming that the resolutions were to favor temporary location at the former place. Miller of Huron led on one side of the discussion and McClure and Miller of Pierre, Regan of Aurora, and Foster of Davidson on the other. The following delegates were selected to go to Washington:

Judges Tripp and Spencer, F. M. Ziebach, Auditor Ward, Receiver Miller of Huron, James S Foster of Mitchell; alternates, H. F. Fellows of Plankinton, S. A. Ramsey of Woonsocket, I. J. Eales of Gettysburg, with Geo. Beckett of Huron as secretary.

British War in Africa.

The combined force of Egyptians have made an attack upon the rebel position at Sunkim in Africa. The British lost four men killed and two wounded during a gallant cavalry charge. The Egyptian and black regiment charged the trenches and carried them brilliantly, losing two men killed and thirty wounded. The only officers wounded in the attacking force were two Egyptians. The rebel loss is now stated to have been 400. An official dispatch from Gen. Grenfell says: The hussars who followed the fleeing Arabs have returned. They chased the enemy to a point within four miles of Handoub. The enemy were still flying. Before dawn next morning the British man-of-war Starling and an Egyptian steamer moved up the coast with orders to cover the rebels at Handoub. At daybreak the forts opened fire upon the rebel trenches and the troops advanced to the attack, the black brigade on the right flank and the cavalry and mounted infantry covering The Scottish Borderers, the Welch regiment and the Egyptian brigade occupied an embankment between the forts, the British infantry being held in reserve. The forts shelled the trenches, keeping up a terrific fire. The enemy held their ground with intense courage, until the black brigade charged the trenches, which fell after half an hour's hard fighting. The rebels fought with fanatical bravery. Two of the enemy's guns were captured.

Osman Digna's nephew and twelve dervishes were made prisoners in the fight. They are wounded. Complaints are being made regarding the quality of the sabres furnished the cavalry, three of which were broken in the attack. The men also complain that their movements are hindered by their heavy revolvers.

Joseph Hair, a young man in the employ of John Kelly, a rich bachelor living two miles east of Oakland, Iowa was brutally murdered. He heard a noise in the barn and went out to discover the cause. He was gone longer than seemed necessary, and Kelly went out to learn the reason. When discovered Hair was unconscious. He died the next day, never recovering sufficiently to give any intimation as to the perpetrators of the deed, or how it was done. There is no clue to the murderer, but the theory is prevalent that he laid in wait for Kelly, who carries money with him, and in the darkness killed the wrong man. Hair lived near Council Bluffs, and was twenty-six years old, and steady and industrious.

DAKOTA JOTTINGS.

The very latest craze among the young bloods at Sioux Falls is to learn how to spar,

Madison steps out and declares herself a candidate for the capital of South Dakota.

The board of health at Yankton has ordered the Sunday-schools to be suspended until further notice.

The last brick was laid on the mammoth five-story hotel at Grand Forks amid the joyous shouts of the people.

Letcher now has an artesian well which gushes forth 300 barrels per hour of clear soft water.

There are eighty-eight prisoners in the territorial pen at Sioux Falls.

A celebrated case terminated at Grand Forks in the district court. Henry J. Holbrooke, a juror in the Ward murder trial in 1884, was arrested for perjury, and his case has been continued at every term of court until now. Judge Templeton dismissed the case for want of evidence.

The Lead City Herald says: "A party of young bachelors in this city intend to spend New Year's day in proper style. They intend to have a big dinner for themselves alone on that day that will lay everything else clear in the shade. Married men are barred, and the boys intend filling themselves up—on turkey—for once, at least."

The plans and specifications for the Indian school at Pierre have been approved by the interior department, and bids for the erection of the buildings will be advertised for at once, so that by spring it is expected that work will be well along. There is an appropriation of $25,000 available for the preliminary work and foundations, and $100,000 more will be available when needed for the work of construction. This will place the school ahead of those at Carlisle, Pa., and Hampton, Va., so far as cost and accommodations for pupils are concerned.

Summoned Aloft.

A compositor in the London establishment of the Messrs. Cassell, publishers, committed suicide recently. He left the following note, addressed to the foreman: "Dear Mr. Shinner: Please excuse my leaving without the usual fortnight's notice, but I have recieved a peremptory summons to go to Heaven to get the title page of the Book of Life. Yours, H. G. S. Agnew." The jury rendered a verdict of temporary insanity.

MISTS OF MEMORY.

Baleful mists of Memory,
  Veiling all the happy past,
Dimming old-time joy and glee!
Baleful mists of Memory,
Shrouding love and sympathy
  With a darkness that must last!
Baleful mists of Memory,
  Veiling all the happy past!

Loving mists of memory,
  Veiling sorrows of the past—
Woes that came so bitterly!
Loving mists of Memory,
Hiding aye, on Life's fair sea,
  All the wreckage shoreward cast
Loving mists of Memory
  Veiling sorrows of the past!

The Origin of Some Christmas Customs.

It is always an interesting subject to find out about the beginning of things. Genesis as the Book of Beginnings, has always interested Bible readers above all other books in the sacred Scripture.

How do we come to have a Christmas tree? The legend goes that when Eve plucked the apple in the Garden of Eden, the tree changed into a fir tree in horror at the sin of disobedience to God, it ceased to bear fruit and took on a sombre hue; but under the influence of the Christmas spirit of peace and good will it once more is made to yield fruit in the form of lights and presents. So every time we light the tapers on the fir tree and load its branches with gifts we recall the victory through Christ over the disobedience which led men astray.

Why do we give presents? Because in Rome at the feast of Saturnalia, which occured at the same time now celebrated in honor of the Christ child, presents were interchanged between masters and slaves, parents and children. The most common present was a taper made of white wax, significant of the fact that love makes light. So the Christmas tree is bespangled with wax tapers taking us back to the time when Rome was mistress of the world. The church finding the feast of Saturnalia well established consecrated it to the service of Jesus and made it a feast of the nativity, At the feast of Mithras the Parthian monarch descended from his throne, shook hands with one of the common people, saying: "I am one of you." So at the feast of Saturnalia the slaves were for a few days on an equality with their masters. And on Christmas day in Christian lands, young and old, poor and rich, become for a brief space equal and revive the memories of the old Roman festival. Some people suppose that St. Nicholas is a German saint and that Santa Claus is his wife. St. Nicholas, according to church tradition, was born in Italy and from childhood was distinguished for his freedom from sin. And Santa Claus is simply another name for St. Nicholas. But why does he always come down the chimney? To answer this question we must go back to our Norse ancestors, who worshiped Goddess Hertha, in whose honor the house was decked with evergreens. At one extremity of the great hall which was the living room for the family, stones were placed in the shape of an altar, called Hertha's stones, from which our word "hearthstone." On these stones were piled fir boughs and a light applied. As the boughs were consumed the Goddess Hertha was supposed to descend and to guide the smoke that the wise men and women might foretell the destinies of each person present from the movements of smoke wreaths. So like the Goddess Hertha St. Nicholas comes down the chimney.

Christmas eve was regarded as the holiest night in the year, on which the Wandering Jew slept once every year, when Pilate, whose spirit haunted Mt. Pilatus, in Switzerland, in the vain endeavor to wash its hands clean had a brief rest. On this night the quivering aspen tree ceases the motion of its leaves, which have continued since its wood was used for the cross; the respite given because from the same wood was made the cradle in which the holy child was rocked. Other curious legends concerning the sacred night might be given, but space forbids.

One other custom must be explained, the use of the holly in Christmas decorations; from this it is believed that the crown of thorns was made with which Jesus was crowned. Before the holly had been used for this purpose the berries were white, but ever after the holly bore red berries, as the story runs.

"For Santa Claus's Sake."

Children—well, it is their season of the year just now, and their imaginations are at work in the most lively manner, wondering what will be their pleasant fate on Christmas morning. But they will get things mixed. A youngster who has heard all the delightful and rollicking stories about Santa Claus, and the sweet and tender stories of Christ, somehow is unable to separate the two in his mind. The other night, as he folded his night-robe about him and dropped on his knees at the bedside, he inaugurated this new ritual:

"Oh! Lord, make me a good boy, for Santa Claus's sake. Amen. What are you going to give me Christmas, mamma?"—Hartford Post.

Holly.

The colored people of New Jersey are busy picking holly for winter decorations. It is not popularly known that there are several species of holly, only one of which is pre-eminently noted for its curious and beautiful foliage. The berries of this are dull-tinted and few compared with those of another kind of holly, whose leaves fall like other deciduous leaves. The handsomest bunches of holly sold are made up of clusters of brilliant globes from the latter species against a background of green from the former. The evergreen holly, or ilex, is almost identical with the English holly.

"And now, children," remarked the Sunday-school superintendent, "what happened to those wicked people who reviled Noah and refused to heed his warning? Where did they find themselves when the flood came?" "In de soup!" exclaimed a class of newsboys, on a back seat, with one voice.

The New York Hebrew Standard and the Rochester Jewish Tidings, both advocate the celebration of Sunday instead of Saturday as the Hebrew's day of rest. They advocate the change from business reasons and inexorable necessity.

An unusual accident happened to a Cincinnati horse, which stood backed up against the curb, with its head over the car track. The animal, having raised its head to avoid being struck by a car undertook to lower it before the vehicle passed, and in doing so thrust it in the window. The poor beast was horribly lacerated and, it is believed, will have to be killed.

The Amir of Afghanistan has imposed a heavy tax on all books and printed matter passing through his dominions, which will destroy the lucrative book trade between India and Central Asia. He desired to check the circulation of treasonable proclamations which Ishak Khan spread at the beginning of rebellion, and has probably succeeded in his intent.

One of the longest inter-town fights ever known in Maine, was that over the construction of the bridge across the Sebasticook river at Peltoma Point, between the towns of Pittsfield and Detroit. The movement for the building of the bridge began in 1848. The former town wanted it; the latter town opposed it. The fight went on year after year. Every board of County Commissioners was drawn into it. Not until 1888, when the bridge was built, was the war ended.

Society in Kansas City is all broken up because Miss Kitty Eeverest, daughter of a leading and wealthy lawyer, has made a runaway match with a drummer from Boston. Her father had known of the drummer's attentions, and some time ago he took his daughter on an extended European trip and offered her $100,000 in cash if she would give up the drummer. But the girl declared that not even $1,000,000 would tempt her to do so, or would prevent her from marrying the man of her choice. Then the father forbade the drummer to enter the house, but the young people contrived to see each other and the result was the marriage.

An instance of the quiet grit some young women display is to be found in Indiana. Miss Lillie Cash teachs a country school four miles from Richmond, in which town she lives. She walks out in the morning to her school and walks back at night. She has done this night and morning for several weeks, and intends to keep up the practice all winter. Her school gave an exhibition, during the progress of which the curtains on the stage caught fire and a panic followed, until the plucky young teacher gathered the burning curtains in her hands, tore them down and threw them outdoors. She saved the building and quieted the children, but was severely burned herself. Nevertheless, she will continue her eight-mile daily walk.

THE NEWS RESUME.

About Washington.

The president returned to the attorney general the papers in relation to the application for pardon of Benjamin Hopkins of Ohio, under sentence for embezzling and misapplying the funds of a national bank, with the following endorsement: "The condition of this convict's health is such, as appears from an examination which I have set on foot, that the question presented whether he shall die in prison or at home. On this presentation I am willing that he shall spend his remaining few days among his friends, regardless of any other consideration connected with the case. And on this ground alone his pardon is granted."

The Casualty Calendar.

Steven Cummings, the boy arrested on suspicion of causing the death of Jacob Brabander at La Crosse confessed that it was his gun that caused Berbander's death. The two were sitting together in the grass with the guns cocked and lying beside them when some ducks came in sight, and in grasping his gun quickly it was discharged. He was frightened and told the story he did. The district attorney believes this story and will not indict him.

In the ruins of the Exchange hotel, which burned at Missoula, Montana, were found the charred remains of a man and possible two men. The remains were almost totally destroyed, but the location of the charred pieces of flesh on the bones and other circumstances point strongly to the destruction of lives. The evidence at the coroner's jury made it quite certain that a railroad man named Hawkins perished. He was last seen on the porch of the second story in company with an unknown man. Both entered the building, and a moment afterward flames burst through the door which they had entered.

Talk About People.

The story that Gen. Harrison intended to visit New York to be the guest of Stephen B. Elkins next month, turns out to be an error founded on the fact that Mrs. Harrison is going. Her purpose is simply to pay a friendly visit and incidentally to put herself in the hands of the milliners and dressmakers. She will be entertained by Mrs. Elkins and Mrs. Morton.

Petty Criminalities.

Burglars entered the German Catholic church at Belle Chester, eight miles north of Wazeppa. A few nights ago by removing a pane of glass and made away with $200 worth of silverware belonging to the church society.

John Meyers Doremus hanged in jail at Hockensock, N. J. for the murder of his nineteen-year-old son while the latter was defending his mother from the abuse of the murderer. The crime for which Doremus was hanged was perpetrated on the afternoon of the 16th day of June last. He came home drunk and as was his wont proceeded to beat his wife. His son had frequently protested against his father's brutality toward his mother, and this time interfered. His father becoming enraged seized a carving knife and plunged it into the boy's breast; the latter falling dead into his mother's arms.

A nephew of the late Gen. Gordon is a member of Gen. Grenfell's staff, and had much to do with the planning of the works at Suakim and the placing of the guns on the fortifications. The bad quality of the bayonets and sabres used by the troops at Suakim is much commented upon. Many bayonets were twisted in the fight, and one hussar was killed by his sabre breaking. During the fight at Suakim, Ali Khoor, a stalwart black, used his Enfield bayonet with such force that the steel broke six inches from the point. The barrel of his rifle twisted out of shape. Ali Khoor is said to have killed twenty Arabs single-handed. Fully 100 of the Enfield rifles used by the blacks were twisted or broken.

Henry Lynch, a confidence man, was arrested at Chicago as he was about to work the "combination lock" game on John C. Nevins, a young man from Grafton, Dak. Nevins says Lynch was very friendly, and asked him if he would like to see the water-works. He said he would, and they left the depot together. Lynch led him around the large grain elevators on the docks, and while on this trip picked up a combination lock which he tried in vain to open. While working at the lock Lynch's partner appeared on the scene, and Nevins was induced to bet $45 that he could not open it. The money had been put up and was in Lynch's pocket, when officers who had been following them arrested Lynch. His partner escaped. Lynch is an old-timer at the skin-game business. Nevins will leave Chicago as quickly as possible after appearing against Lynch to-morrow morning.

The young wife of Dr. O. C. Meyers of Stevens Point, Wis., committed suicide by shooting herself through the head with a revolver. Some suspicion rests on her husband, She quarreled with him, and he left home to eat supper at the hotel. The quarrel was resumed next morning, and he threatened to go out for breakfast. While leaving the house he heard a report in his wife's bedchamber, and entering saw her lying on the floor. The bullet entered the mouth and passed through the back of the head, causing instant death. The deceased was twenty-two years of age and leaves no children. Dr. Meyer is a successful physician and surgeon, and the founder of the St. Louis hospital. He has been a prominent politician lately, and has given much attention to sporting matters. It is said that he had a habit of neglecting and abusing his wife.

The body of a woman, whose name is unknown, was found in the streets of Popular, in the suburbs of London. An empty vial lay alongside the body, and the impression first formed was that the woman had committed suicide. At the coroner's inquest however, the physicians who examined the body testified that there were no signs of poison in the stomach, and declared their belief that the woman had been murdered by strangulation. They said the condition of the body justified this belief, and in addition to that they saw marks on the woman's neck that showed that a small cord had been tied around. The woman was of a low character. When the body was found it was still warm. It was lying in an open thoroughfare, and there is no possibility that the woman could have taken her own life. Some persons believe that her murderer is identical with the Whitechapel fiend, who, they think, has adopted a new method of disposing of his victims.

Foreign Gleanings.

Perez Cavalier, late secretary to the Spanish legation at Yokohama, arrived at Winnipeg, en route from Japan to Washington. In an interview he said that when he left Japan it was currently reported in diplomatic circles there that a secret treaty had been concluded between Russia and Japan against England. The reason for this treaty was that Russia feared that in the event of war with England the Japanese government would favor the latter country and thus give the British government a tremendous advantage in their operations in the Pacific ocean, and permit an easy descent upon Siberia. To overcome this, Russia has of late been paving the way for an amicable understanding with the Japanese court a few months ago the czar had conferred upon the empress of Japan, the decoration of the Order of St. Catherine.

Other News Jottings.

Miners exploring with a diamond drill in the old Saginaw mine in Michigan, cut into a sixteen foot vein of slate iron ore. This mine which produced over half a million tons of ore up to 1883 was abandoned then as worked out. The recent discovery will result in starting up the mine.

The supreme court of Ohio decided that the creditors of the late Archbishop Purcell cannot cause the sale of the church property, which was in his name at the time of his death, to pay the $3,000,000 he held in trust from his parishioners. The court holds that the property was never really his, but held in trust simply. The decision of the court below is confirmed.

It is understood that General Master Powderly will shortly issue a circular to all Knights of Labor pointing out the necessity for laws making employers liable to employes for loss of life or time through accidents occurring through the negligence or indifference of employers or their agents. He will advise a course of action for every assembly in the order throughout the United States. Officers of the Miners' National Trade District will also issue an appeal to their members, urging them not to join the American Federation of Labor, but to remain with the Knights of Labor. In the Journal of United Labor, issued in Philadelphia, Mr. Powderly says, over his own name: "Since the first session of the general assembly eight state labor bureaus and a national department of labor have been established; and to this order, more than any other cause, must the credit of the agitation which produced these results be given. Even our worst enemies will accord that credit to this organization."

The War in Hayti.

Capt. Kelly, of the steamer Saginaw, which arrived in New York from Hayti, would not make any report of Haytien affairs, but it was learned from other sources that the steamer Haytien Republic was still, in the harbor of Port Au Prince, when the Saginaw sailed, and that the insurgents were to attack Cape Haytien on Dec. 5. Passengers by the Saginaw bring important news from Hayti. On the morning of Dec. 5, the passengers state, four of Legitimes men of war—the Dessoline, Belize, Toussaint L'Overteure and one other bombarded Cape Hayti. The gunboats dropped anchor four or five miles off the shore, lying broadside to the town. The vessels' guns were fired with blank cartridges to give notice of the warlike intentions. The foreign consuls in the city sent out a petition to the commander of the fleet asking time to get out of the city. They were given thirty six hours to evacuate the town. The people filed into the hills, taking all the possessions they could conveniently carry. They loaded their effects on the backs of mules which could only carry "acarga" each, which is 250 pounds. The supply of pack mules being limited to fifty or sixty, the animals were in great demand, and fabulous prices were paid to convey a single mule load of the more valuable effects of the wealthy residents to a place of safety. A wealthy resident by the name of Morel paid $100 for the use of a single animal for the afternoon of the first day on which the people had to remove their effects. Incidents of a similar nature marked the second day, and those of the poorer classes who were fortunate enough to own a mule preferred renting it out to using the animals to save their own goods. Shortly after daybreak on the second day after the arrival of the fleet the Haytian officers trained their guns on the town and the bombardment commenced.

The bamboo huts succumbed easily, but the stone buildings in the central and more elevated portion of the town were not so easily destroyed, the heavy walls resisting the fire for several hours. Despite the warning they had received to leave the fatal town, many of the residents clung to their habitations. In fact it was impossible to remove many of the sick in the city within the time allotted by Legitime.

A Startling but Doubtful Glory.

The New York Herald has the following story:

INDIANAPOLIS, Dec. 20.—Has an attempt been made to take the life of President elect Harrison? The question is a startling one, and that there should be any fact to justify the asking of it seems incredible. Nevertheless a rumor justifying the inquiry has crept out, and the source of it is such that they cannot do otherwise than send such information, which is but little as can be obtained concerning it. There are many who believe the rumor to be well founded, and later developments are awaited with great interest. The facts, so far as they can be stated, are that a close friend of the Harrison family told a story to a confidential friend which, if true, will startle the nation and the entire civilized world. It was to the effect that a well laid plot to take the life of Gen. Harrison was arranged by a gang of blood-thirsty villians, and that an attempt to execute their dastardly designs was make one day last week, but that the fearful schemes was discovered by one of Gen. Harrison's best friends and thwarted. This startling intelligence has been held as a dead secret and is said that Gen. Harrison and his family intended that it should never be made public. The one or two persons who have been entrusted with the facts still decline to give any details, and it is only possible to give the mere statement at this time. The person who is my informant said, as he whispered the secret to me, that the strangest thing to him was, that so great and terrible an affair had been kept a secret so long. He declines at this time to tell where and when the affair happened. It is well known, however, that Gen. Harrison daily exposes himself to any such vile purpose, as it is his custom to take two walks each day, and usually he strolls mostly, when alone, in the back streets of the northern part of the city. He is seldom accompanied by any one, and he would prove an easy victim for any would-be assassin. Of course, the publication of the fact will no doubt lead to a thorough investigation of the affair, and a determined effort will be made to bring the would-be assassins to justice.

News From Stanley.

Letters dated Stanley Falls, Aug. 29, have been delivered here by Tippoo Tib's men. They state that a letter was received at Stanley Falls from Henry M. Stanley on Aug. 28. Stanley was then at Bonyala, on the Auriwhimi, where he had arrived on Aug. 27. He had left Emin Pasha eighty-two days before in perfect health and provided with plenty of food. Stanley had returned to Bonyala for the loads of stores in charge of his rear guard, and intended to leave ten days later to join Emin. He reported all the whites in the expedition as healthy, and said the expedition wanted nothing. The West African Telegraph company has received the following dispatch from St. Thomas, dated Friday, 2 p. m.:

I have just received information that Henry M. Stanley, with Emin Pasha, has arrived on the Auriwhimi. The news is reliable Further details will follow. PARSONS. Agent.

In the Stanley Falls advices it is stated that Stanley wrote that Emin was in possession of vast stores of ivory and many oxen, and that he had an abundance of food. Stanley intended to leave Bonyala at the end of August.

In the British house of commons Mr. Goschen, the acting government leader, read, amid cheers, the telegram received by the West Telegraph company from St. Thomas reporting the arrival of Stanley and Emin on the Aruwhimi. Mr. Goschen stated that the government had not received any direct official news confirming this report. Referring to the report that Gen. Grenfell's next march would be against Handoub, Mr. Goschen stated that the government had no news from Gen. Grenfell showing that it was his intention to undertake such a march.

The New Sioux Bill.

The house committee on Indian affairs have agreed to report the Gifford bill for the opening of the Sioux reservation, with a few amendments. The first change in the bill provides that the Indians shall have $1.25 per acre for the land taken up the first three years. The Gifford bill provided that the price per acre should be $1 for the first two years. This is the only change in price, the remaining lands to be sold for 75 cents per acre for the next two years, and all remaining after that are to be open to the public at 50 cents per acre. At the end of ten years the government shall have the right to step in and take the remaining lands at 50 cents per acre. Another charge provides that one-third of the sum realized from the sale of lands shall be put aside to pay the expenses of educating the Indians, and the remaining two-thirds shall be distributed pro rata among the Indians. This price per acre granted in the bill to be the Indians is a complete concession to their demands in this particular, but is against the advice of the secretary of the interior, who believed that $1 per acre, coupled with four years' residence demand, was ample sufficient to ask settlers. The bill offered by the house by Mr Peel by request will not be considered by the committee.

"No, I did not eat with the family. 'Twas not what I was there for. My place was to serve their meals when they ate. It needed one to wait upon the table, and I was that one. "Did I feel degraded? "No, why should I any more than the doctor did when he attended to the needs of a patient, or the saleswoman does in a store when she waits on a customer?"—Hired Girl, in Rural New-Yorker.

Mammoth Commercial Combination.

The latest scheme credited to the fertile brain of President A. B. Stickney, of the Chicago, St. Paul & Kansas City railroad, is nothing more nor less than the purchase and unification of the entire traffic interests of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, and the consolidation of the St. Paul & Duluth, Duluth & Iron Range and the Kansas City railroads with the river levees in one grand system.

Mr. Stickney's object is to control the two great factors in the freight business—the iron ore and coal shipments. He will take the iron ore from the mines about Lake Superior, bring it by rail to St. Paul, and transship it here by boat down the Mississippi river and up the Ohio river to the iron mills at Pittsburg. He will bring the coal back over the same route from the mines of Pennsylvania, and will make St. Paul the distributing point for the entire Northwest.

There is every reason to believe that Mr. Stickney's plans have already been consummated. If this is so the Western railroads and the transportation lines of the great lakes will no longer control the situation.

A dispatch from Pittsburg stated that a syndicate of Pittsburg capitalists have about completed the purchase of Gray's Iron line and had secured controlling interests in the "Diamond Jo" line. Simultaneously came the announcement of the purchase of the old Davidson line or the St. Paul & St. Louis Packet line by a syndicate of St. Paul men, composed of Messrs. C. H. Petsch, R. T. O'Connor, T. A. Prendergast, E. C. Lang, William Hamm and H. F. Stevens. One of the gentlemen interested said:

The construction of immense coal and ore docks at South St. Paul will begin at once, and at least $250,000 will be expended on these improvements. Mr. Stickney has long had in his mind the necessity of extending his system to Duluth and to the iron mines. He has considered the building of a new line, but to get hold of the St. Paul & Duluth is more desirable. By bringing the ore to St. Paul, and thence to Pittsburg by the river route, instead of via the lake route as most of it goes now, it will have to be rehandled but once instead of twice. This is one great argument in favor of the plan. Pittsburg must have the ore. Of late years the Pittsburg capitalists have become alarmed at the increase of the iron-manufacturing industries of Toledo, Cleveland, Buffalo and other ports, made possible by their easier access to the mines. The cost of getting the ore to Pittsburg will be greatly lessened by utilizing the rivers, and this condition alone makes the Pittsburg men take hold of the new scheme with a will. The great benefit which St. Paul will derive is obvious. She need no longer sigh for a waterway to the lakes or look with jealous eyes on the commercial growth of Duluth. She will be in reality as well as name the head of navigation of the great river, and will begin to reap the profits of her geographical position. The river traffic will be thoroughly revived and put back on the flourishing basis of early days. The purchase of the old lines is only preliminary. It was necessary to get the wharfage and other facilities.

There is no doubt that the buying up of the river lines by Pittsburg and St. Paul people is in furtherance of Mr. Stickney's scheme. One the St. Paul men admitted this when questioned. Mr. Stickney is at present in the East.

The trip from St. Paul to Pittsburg can be made in from seven to ten days by a steamer towing three barges of 3,000 tons capacity. The traffic will not of course, be confined to coal and ore alone, but merchandise freight of all description will be taken. St. Paul merchants can get their importations from the seaport via Pittsburg as well as by the Buffalo-Duluth route. The way freight business will not be neglected, and a special attention will be given to the passenger and excursion business. A side issue will be the running of a fine new excursion boat between St. Paul and Red Wing during the summer months.

Is Stanley Safe!

In the British house of commons, Mr Smith the government leader, replying to Mr. Wilfrid Lawson, said that so far as was known to the government the letter written by Osman Digna announces the surrender of Emin Pasha and a white traveler. The government had no means of knowing whether these allegations were well founded. Mr. Stanhope, minister of war, replying to Mr. Dillon, stated that the cost of the army of occupation in Egypt during the current year would be £110,000. This expense would be borne by Egypt. If the operations entailed further expenditures, the government would consider how they should be met The Egyptian government had approved the sending of reinforcements to Suakim. It is rumored that Osman Digna in his letter expressed a willingness to surrender Emin pasha and his white companion, provided Egypt would agree to abandon Suakim. If this proposal is not accepted, it is believed that both captives will be killed. Along with his letter Osman Digna sent several Snider cartridges, which he alledged were taken from the travelers. The Zanzibaris in Stanley's expedition were armed with Snider rifles, but there were none in the possession of the dervishes. Gen. Grenfell recognized the letter which Osman Digna had enclosed as the original one which he had drafted for the khedive. Thus Stanley's capture is virtually beyond a doubt. The Congo State officials have not been informed of the matter.

Osman Digna's letter was a reply to Maj. Bundle's request of last August for news of Emin Pasha. The letter asserts that the Mahdi has conquered the whole of the equatorial provinces. The Lado letters stated that one white man escaped. It is reported that the wounds of Osman Naib, the rebel commander, are serious. Heavy firing continues.

The Emin relief expedition committee are doubtful of the genuineness of the Osman Digna letter. They suggest that the khedive's letter may be a copy stolen at Cairo, but they think it more likely that Stanley sent on runners to Emin with letters, and that these runners were captured. In any case, they are hopeful that even if Emin is a captive Stanley is free.

The Latest About Stanley.

SUAKIM, Dec. 16.—The khalifa's letter to Osman Digna stated that a steamer expedition to the equator, commanded by Osman Seleh, on arriving at Lado, Osman Pasha and a white traveler were delivered to them in chains by Emin's officers and troops. Osman Seleh, in his letter to the khalifa, stated that he reached Lado on Oct. 11, and the khedive had sent a white traveler named Stanley with a letter telling Emin to go with Stanley, and offering the remainder of the force the option of going to Cairo or remaining. They refused to enter the Turkish service and gladly received Osman Seleh. He heard that another traveler had visited Emin, but had gone, and he was searching for him.

BERLIN, Dec. 16.—Herr Merensky, chief of the African missions, thinks that Emin may have been captured, but not Stanley. It is more likely, he says, that the "White Traveler" referred to by Osman Digna is Capt. Casate, the Italian explorer. Lieut. Wissmann has received no counter-orders as yet with regard to the relief expedition. If the Osman Digna reports are true the Wissmann expedition will be useless. Some journals argue that it will take at least four months to cover the distance which the report, must travel from Lado, and that therefore they must be false.

SUAKIM, Dec. 16.—The natives do not believe that the equatorial provinces have submitted to the Mahdi. If they had, the natives say, proclamations to the people of Emin's territory and other official acts of the Mahdi would have been made public and the surrender of Suakim would have been demanded. A coast guard steamer which has just arrived from the south heard nothing of the alleged capture of Emin.

In the British house of commons, Lord Randolph Churchill asked whether the reports of the capture of Emin Pasha and Mr. Stanley were well founded, and also whether the government would negotiate with Osman Digna for the release of the Europeans at Khartoum before the beginning of hostilities. Mr. Goschen, the acting government leader, replied that the information received by the government was so uncertain that it would be impossible to suspend the operations for the relief of Suakim during the many weeks that would elapse before the fate of the explorers could be ascertained. John Morley pressed the government to suspend operations at Suakim until Monday next. Mr. Goschen replied that the request could not be complied with; but he promised that no instructions would be given to hurry, the operations.

Mr. Morley—May I take it, that the government will do the best it can to prevent the commencement of hostilities without tying the hands of the military authorities?

Mr. Goschen—I cannot tie the hands of the military authorities. I shall not go an inch beyond the statement that I have already made.

Everybody believes that Emin Bey and Henry M. Stanley are both prisoners of the Mahdi. It is at least certain from Osman Digma's letter that the Mahdi is in possession of a number of things which Stanley is known to have carried with him, and is assumed that both the European's lives are too valuable from a hostage point of view to be sacrificed by the Soudanese. In the light of this discovery it is probably that the Soudanese fight will be indefinitely postponed.

RACE WAR AT THE SOUTH.

A Riot in Which One Hundred and Fifty Blacks and a Dozen Whites are Killed.

WAHALAK, Miss., Dec. 17.—There was a terrible riot at this place last night, and today twelve white men and 150 negroes lie dead as a result. For a long time there has been much ill feeling between the whites and blacks here, which has been aggravated by the impertinence of the latter, and yesterday the two elements became involved in a quarrel which ended in great loss of life. The facts as far as they can be ascertained; are as follows: A negro and a white man quarreled, and the negro was killed. This was an excuse for an assault, and the negroes immediately swept down upon the whites, who were greatly outnumbered. Knowing that it would be a fight to death, the whites prepared to receive their black assailants, and when the battle was ended it was found that twelve white men and over one hundred and fifty blacks had been killed. The only particulars to be had are as follows: Some two months ago a white farmer living a few miles from the almost desolate village, lost his gin house, together with eight or ten bales of cotton, by a fire, which was evidently the work of an incendiary. Suspicion was at once directed to one of the negroes living in the vicinity, with whom the farmer had had some trouble. The officers in the meantime had been searching for evidence against the negroes. At a late hour, sufficient evidence having been secured, one of the negroes was approached by an officer, who demanded that he surrender. The negro became furious and terribly, assaulted the officer, after which he made his escape. This attack on an officer of the law aroused the indignation of the few white citizens in the neighborhood, who organized themselves to capture, not to mob the fugitive. The woods in the vicinity were scoured, but without result. Not a trace of him could be found, and it was decided by the posse to act in a body and surround his premises. They had proceeded only a few miles in the direction of the negroes house, when from an ambush came a deadly volley. Fifty well armed negroes composed the mob. After every white man had fallen to the ground the negroes dispersed. The horror-stricken people have telegraphed for aid.

THE BATTLE.

When the negroes were called upon to surrender they refused to pay any attention to the officer or his warrant, and defied the law and the authorities, saying Maury should not be arrested. Not satisfied with defying the law, they attacked the officer and beat him until he was more dead than alive before they would allow him to go. He returned to the town and summoned a posse of twelve white men, who proceeded at once to the point where the negroes were fortified, to demand the surrender of Maury. The negroes, however, had abandoned their house and secreted in the woods near-by and as the constable and his posse neared the house, they were fired upon from the ambush. Constable L. Cobb and four of his posse fell dead at the first volley and there was only one man among the twelve who escaped entirely whole some of them being very seriously wounded. The whites, seing they were only a handful compared to the large crowd of negroes who were opposed to them, and who numbered several hundred, retreated, leaving their dead on the field, and followed by the jeers and shouts of the black murderers, who were armed to the teeth, and had used double-barreled shot guns with such deadly effect on the officers of the law. Upon the return of the remainder of the posse to the town, the scenes was one of the wildest excitement. The situation was telegraphed to the neighboring towns and preparations were at once made to attack the negroes as soon as reinforcements arrived. The news of the slaughter caused intense excitement wherever it was made known. Offers of assistance came from all quarters.

What the Laborers Want.

The first work before the American Federation of the Labor in session at St. Louis was the reception of the report of the committee on boycott and labor. The committee recommended several boycotts. The convention then endorsed the use of union labels. The report of the committee on constitution was taken up and considered seriatim. During the debate some serious reflections were cast upon the Knights of Labor, and the assertion made that that order was rapidly disintegrating. O. R. Lake, representing the International Typographical union, defended the Knights and claimed there was no foundation for statements that the order was dwindling away. Committee on constitution continued its report. A provision for bonding the president and treasurer to the amount of $2,000 was adopted; also a provision setting the per capita tax from affiliated bodies at one cent per month, and $25 per year from central labor unions. The incoming executive council was ordered to devise a plan for industrial divisions or trade sections. The committee on "the eight-hour day" reported, favoring simultaneous mass meetings throughout the country for the purpose of furthering the eight-hour movement. They named the following dates for holding such meetings, viz: Feb. 22, 1889; July 4, 1889; Labor Day (first Monday in September) 1889, and again on Feb. 22, 1890; recommending that the secretary of the federation shall collect all possible statistics bearing upon the question and its chances of success; also that where possible, amiable arrangements shall be made with employers for the short time. The committee declined to set a definite day for the enforcement of the demand for eight hours, throwing that question back to the federation for its decision. Lavine of Chicago wanted May 1, 1890, as the date, and also wanted the demand confined to the building trades only. Much eloquence was poured out on the subject; everybody wanted eight hours, and most of them wanted May 1, 1890, set as the day for the demand—which was finally agreed to. Resolutions were adopted:

Favoring the Australian system of voting; requesting President Harrison to appoint a union printer to the position of public printer; asking from legislatures and congress the repeal of all conspiracy laws; and the passage of the bill now before congress to confine convicts-made goods to the states where manufactured, and prohibiting the importation of convict-made goods; asking the abolition of contract work on all public works; and favoring compulsory education.

The federation then went into executive session for the consideration of matters not desired to be made public.

Five Men Killed.

A horrible disaster, resulting in the death of five men occurred on the grounds of the Stevens' Point Water Works company at Stevens' Point, Wis. A defective scaffolding inside the standpipe collapsed and precipitated five men to the ground, a distance of ninety-five feet mangling them beyond recognition. Ten men were at work on top of the pipe at the time, and when without a moment's warning the staging gave way five of them barely had time to spring for their lives and catch at the brim of the pipe. The other five were at work a few feet below the rig, and as they had no support to cling to were carried down the long shaft with the treacherous staging and four of them met instantaneous death upon the solid masonry below. The fifth lived a few hours, but did not regain consciousness.

All were young men and single excepting Meyers, who leaves a wife and four children. The five who were left clinging to the rim of the pipe held bravely on, and with each other's assistance safely reached the ladder on the outside of the standpipe. John Rowe, one of the survivors, was instrumental in saving the lives of his fellows. When he heard the crash he clutched the rim of the pipe with one hand and with the other grasped the hand of the one next to him. J. M. Dean, the foreman, was slightly injured while standing at the bottom of the pipe. When he heard the timbers cracking he jumped for the opening, and received slight bruises from flying debris. Just how the accident occurred is not known. The scaffolding was built up from the ground inside the pipe, but of frail material.

Rev. James Dougherty, a Southern Catholic priest, was arrested and fined for intoxication in Brooklyn. The reverend gentlemen was found lying drunk near the Gowanus canal. He was arraigned in court and on his promise to reform the justice let him off with a fine of $1.

THE CAMPAIGN CONDENSED.

The Five Republican Congressmen Receive Majorities Aggregating 32,456.

In the First district Mr. Dunnell's official plurality is 1,844, as against 2,828 for Wilson in 1886. The total vote at the late election was 37,382, as against 33,612, a gain of 3,770. The Republican gain in the district is 4,166, while the Democrats lose 506. The Prohibition vote is but 120 larger than two years ago. The logic of these figures is that not only was almost all the new vote of the district cast for Mr. Dunnell, but Tom Wilson lost some of those who were foolish enough to vote for him two years ago. Mr. Dunnell carried seven of the nine counties by pluralities ranging from 908 in Fillmore to 68 in Olmsted. Wilson carried Winona county, his own home, by 1,194, as against 1,745 in 1886.

The Second District.

In John Lind's district, although the total vote was 45,118, an increase of 6,836 over two years ago, Lind's plurality was 9,219 as against 9,648, showing that the new vote was divided in almost exactly the old proportion. The Prohibition vote in this district shows an increase of 810, and there were 15 scattering.

The Third District.

In the Third district D. S. Hall's plurality was 2,868. The total vote in this district varies only about 125 from that of the First district, though the gain in two years was slightly larger—4,150. The result of the election was also very similar. The Republican vote showed an increase almost identicle with the increase in the population, and the Democratic vote failed to hold its own. The Prohibitionists gained about 900 votes. Kandiyohi is the banner county of this district, and gave Mr. Hall 2,088 votes to 427 for MacDonald.

The Fourth District.

The Fourth district bears out the peculiarity noticed in the First and Third. The Democratic vote is but 180 greater than that cast two years ago, while the total vote of the district is increased 17,447. The Prohibition gain is 1,731, and the rest of the gain all goes to the Republican vote, changing the majority for Rice in 1886 of 5,125 to one of 10,006 for Capt. Snider.

Irregular Ballots.

The votes of several counties for various candidates were thrown out owing to mistakes in printing the ballots, or mistakes by the auditors in making the record. Hugh Harrison lost 124 in McLeod county, his name being printed Thompson. Hans Mattson figured as Hugh Mattson in Nobles county, and lost 890 votes. Pine county Democrats to the number of 443 voted for David Buck, and the "old Roman of Mankato" loses their votes. John Brederhoff, one of the Prohibition electors, lost almost all his votes, as his initials were wrong in almost every case. None of these mistakes, however, would have changed any results.

The Girl Giggled.

He was middle-aged and greyhaired, with gold-rimmed spectacles, and a benignant forehead, and, says the Chicago Journal, he would be worth interviewing on the consumption of cosmetics by the elite of the South side. Well, he sat in a cable car and looked as if he might have stepped out of one of his own show cases. Presently his eye caught a tiny thread on the outer side of the right knee of his pants. It was so very short it was hard work for his gloved fingers to pick it up. Across the aisle was a pretty operator who works in the rooms of a sewing machine company. Her eyes twinkled as she saw the gentleman succeed in his efforts to capture the thread, and, as it proved to lengthen in pulling, he began to wind it around his fingers. He thought he had hold of a simple basting. She knew that upon that slight thread hung the integrity of his new pants. An expression of mild wonder overspread the face of the intellectual gentleman as the thread continued to come at his gentle pull. He bent his near-sighted eyes nearer to discover the source of this thread supply. Apparently he found it, for a look of horror came into his face. He clutched the skirts of his overcoat tightly about him, hurried off the car, and, probably, headed for a tailor's shop. And when that pretty little sewing machine operator got off at Thirty-ninth street she, was still dimpling with suppressed laughter.

A Woman's Great Invention.

One of the biggest little inventions of recent date is the slotted sewing machine needle, a patent for which was taken out a short time ago by a woman 70 years of age. It does entirely away with the old process of threading by twisting the end of the thread to a fine point and thrusting it at the needle's eye until by some chance it happens to strike the mark. This new invention is domestic economy has a bevelled slot in one side of the eye through which the thread slips as easily as a nickle drops in the slot of a weighing machine or lung tester. A blind old gandmother need not have the slightest difficulty in sewing now. Nothing could be simpler than the slotted needle, and all who see it wonder why it was not thought of years and years ago. The inventor said the other day that it cost $30,000 to make the experiment which resulted in producing precisely the kind of slot which, while readily admitting the thread to the eye, prevents it at the same time from slipping out in the operation of sewing. What a boon this will be to our mothers and wives may be easily realized when it is understood that one sewing machine company alone in New Jersey turns out every month over 2,000,000 needles.

Ex-Senator Conger.

From a Washington Letter.

Ex-Senator Conger is leading a retired life here at present. He drives an old gray horse about the streets, hitched to an old-fashioned rockaway, in which almost daily can be see his portly, good-natured wife with him, They have enough to live on nicely, and are apparently happy and contented. The present Mrs. Conger is his second wife. They were sweethearts when they were young, and there is a romance in their case, which has been printed before, He was a widower and she a widow, and they proposed by letter. Mrs. Conger brought some property, but not a fortune into the marital firm.

Some miscreant threw a dynamite bomb into the cupola of the Litchfield Car and Machine company's foundry at Litchfield, Illinois. The missile exploded, tearing the cupola to pieces and seriously injuring two of the employes.

Hon. H. Steenerson met D. B. Henderson, who is a candidate for Speaker of the House, while in Chicago last summer, and speaks in terms of the highest praise of him. If Minnesota cannot capture the position, we hope our Congressmen will all unite upon the old soldier from Iowa.

Polk County has a number of applicants for appointive positions, all capable men and faithful republicans, deserving of reward. Polk County points with pride to Harrison's plurality of 1385. Merriam's, of 1364 and Comstock's of 1371 and asks that the boys who so faithfully worked to accomplish that glorious result be duly recognized.

The State Board of Canvassers completed their work last week.

Harrison's plurality is	38,107

Why We Prefer Sabin.

Because he is a man of the people and on every question that might arise affecting the right of railroad companies to water stock, thus exacting an undue tax from the people, Mr. Sabin has always been found on the side of the people, therefore we have reason to believe that he always will be. Because he has faithfully discharged his duties during one term and 's by common courtesy entitled to re-election, and, if re-elected he will be right in line for the most important chairmanships, and will get them. Because by his action in the past on an enterprise of vast importance to this Northwest, he has indicated clearly what his career will be in the future and for this reason, (if for no other) he is entitled to the gratitude and hearty support of every inhabitant of this New Northwest. Because, as the western phrase is "he is a safe man to tie to."

HON. H. STEENERSON

For U. S. Dist. Att'y.

Some of our good friends have tackled us because we did not join in the hue and cry raised for Steenerson for senator, and, as they and others really have the idea that Mr. Steenerson is seriously a candidate, we venture a few remarks upon the subject. Mr. Steenerson realizes the fact as well as does THE JOURNAL that we have no earthly show of raising a U. S. Senator in this city this year. He knows that if there was a show his friends would have been on deck for him long since and that they stand ready to do that same in case the opportunity should present itself. But there is a position that we have good reasons for believing that Mr. Steenerson could get, and that he is in every way eminently fitted to fill, and we also believe one that he really desires though as yet he has not announced himself a condidate. THE JOURNAL now takes the liberty to present his name as a candidate and calls upon all his friends to support him for that position. We are satisfied that he can have that position if his friends will unite in the effort to secure it. We have claims upon the party superior to many other localities who have aspirants for the position and so far the offices we have got have been few and far between. This fact is now so well recognized by the party that about all we have to do to get good positions for our citizens is to name good men and push them vigorously. There is no doubt about Mr. Steenerson's ability to creditably represent this state in the U. S. Senate, IF THERE WAS A POSSIBILITY OF HIS ELECTION, and the only result of an active canvass on his part now would be to defeat his chances for the position of U. S. Dist. Atty. It is shrewdly suspected by some that this is the very reason his name was precipitated, if not it was very short-sighted policy on the part of his friends to say the least. We are too good a friend to Mr. Steenerson to sacrifice his true interests for an ignis fatuus, and every true friend of his will manifest it by putting in his work where it will count. Mr. Steenerson stands first in the race for this position and will no doubt be successful if not knifed by his enemies in the guise of fool friends.

FOR U. S. DISTRICT ATTORNEY,

Constitutional Amendment.

The Stephen Leader suggests action on the question of a constitutional amendment. Under the present conditions, much valuable time is frittered away considering some petty bridge bill that has really no business to be before the Legislature anyhow, and, the Leader might have added, that these same bridge bills are often a positive damage by being made trading stock. Thus A. has promised his constituents a bridge across the "Crick" in "Toad Holler." B. has introduced an important bill affecting the welfare of the whole state. A. is not in favor of the bill at all, believes it to be against the best interests of the people but he must have help on his bridge bill so he goes to B. and offers to swap support and of course, B. accepts. The Leader suggests the relegation of all such petty matters from the Legislature to a committee who shall be prepared at all times to examine into the merits of each individual case. It seems as though some remedy could be found.

The D. & W.

The prospects for the building of the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad have improved wonderfully within the past few months and influences are at work that promise the success of the undertaking. For years this country has felt the need of a more direct line to Duluth and our people have been anxiously hoping to see the D. & W. or some other direct line built. It is needless to enumerate the advantages that would be derived as they are fully known and appreciated. We know that such a line would add at the least 5 cents per bushel to the selling price of wheat at every point in the Red River Valley, would make a proportionate reduction on all incoming freights and therefore is of the greatest importance. We now have an opportunity to secure a direct line to Duluth and every citizen in this valley should be ready and willing to do all in his power to aid the project. We do not know that a bonus will be asked of cities and villages along the route but if such should be the case there never could be a line of road built in for which we could afford to pay more. There are other ways in which we can aid this enterprise by helping it to secure needed legislation and by being careful that its friends are selected for important positions. So necessary to the interests of this country is this road that any resident who should presume to oppose the road in any particular should be deemed a traitor to his country and rewarded accordingly. It has already been "a long pull" but now with "a strong pull and a pull altogether" we shall see the road an accomplished fact.

Effects Homestead Entries.

Commissioner Stockslager Decides Approved Entries Cannot be Cancelled.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 10.—A large number of pre-emption and homestead cases, now pending in the general land office, were suspended several years ago by commissioner McFarland, and certain requirements made as to new proof or new notice. When these requirements were fulfilled, it was the caution to write a letter in such cases, stating that the entry was approved for patent. Commissionor Sparks, in many of these cases, made additional requirements and again suspended the entries. Commissioner Stockslager has recently decided that in all cases approved for patent, the commissioner has no power to recall that action, and he has ordered the suspended files in his office to be examined and all such cases tabulated for patent. It is supposed that this order will effect several thousand entries.

The above ruling of Commissioner Stockslager appears to be just and right, and will no doubt be appreciated by those parties who have had their entries suspended but have not as yet gone to the expense of second proof. But there seems to be no redress for those who have already advertised and made second proof along with being deprived of their patent from one to five years longer than they would have been providing the first proof was held good as it should have been.

If our Representatives to Congress from this and other districts would investigate this matter, and after being thoroughly convinced that an injustice has been done the settler, introduce a bill for their benefit whereby they might realize enough out of the enormous surplus in the United States treasury to cover the cost of second proof, of which the settler has been deprived by an unjust and uncalled for ruling of the former commissioners, they would do a good thing for many poor settlers in this country.

CROOKSTON, Minn., Dec. 21, 1888.

ED. JOURNAL: I would like to make a little explanation through the columns of your paper in regard to an article that appeared in your issue of December 20th, entitled "Magnificent Mail Service." You say that a letter mailed at Stephen on Dec. 11th, addressed to THE JOURNAL, was received at your office on Dec. 13th. Our "cattle train," as you are pleased to call it, leaves Stephen at 6-25 p. m., and in my opinion there is just a possible chance that the letter in question might have been mailed in the P. O. at Stephen after 6-25 p. m., on Dec. 11th, in which case I would not receive the letter until Dec. 15th, and it would be distributed in the Crookston P. O. on the morning of the 13th. If the letter was dropped in the car, which you can tell by looking at the postmark, I am willing to acknowledge it an error on my part in misthrowing the letter.

Yours, respectfully,
POSTAL CLERK
On the "Cattle Train."

In relation to the above we interviewed the writer of the letter, who says he placed it in the Stephen post office, together with several others, about 4 p. m. We do not know what agent of the mail service is responsible, if any, but we are of the opinion that we should have received the letter very much sooner if the line north had proper train service.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, County of Polk.—ss.
In Probate Court. Special Term, December 24th, 1888.

In the matter of the estate of Margaret Barfette, deceased.

Whereas, An Instrument in writing, purporting to be the last will and testament of Margaret Barfette, deceased, late of said county, has been delivered to this court.

And whereas, Joseph Barrette of said Polk County has filed therewith his petition, representing among other things, that said Margret Barrette died in said county on the fifth day of December, 1888, testate, and that said petitioner is the sole executor named in said last will and testament, and praying that the said instrument may be admitted to probate, and that letters testamentary be to him issued thereon.

It is ordered, That the proofs of said instrument, and the said petition, be heard before this court, at the probate office in said county, on the 21st day of January A. D. 1889, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, when all concerned may appear and contest the probate of said instrument.

And it is further ordered, That public notice of the time and place of said hearing be given to all persons interested by publication of these orders for three weeks successively previous to said day of hearing, in THE POLK COUNTY JOURNAL, a newspaper printed and published at Crookston in said county.

By the Court.

The National Tribune

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Is one of the less than half-a-dozen really great family papers in the country.

IT IS THE ONLY ONE
Published at the National Capital.
IT IS THE ONLY ONE
Devoted to the history of the war.
IT IS THE ONLY ONE
Devoted to the interests of ex-soldiers and sailors.
IT IS THE ONLY ONE
That makes a bold and persistent fight for their rights.
IT IS THE ONLY ONE
That continually insists on justice being done the country's defenders.
It Has More Distinguished Contributors than Any Other Paper.

A Splendid 8-Page, 56-Column Paper.

Printed on fine paper, edited with signal ability and filled with the most interesting matter that can be procured.

ONLY $1 A YEAR—TWO CENTS A WEEK.

The National Tribune is the result of years of earnest, thoughtful effort, accompanied by a heavy expenditure of money, to build up at the Capital of the country which should be a welcome weekly visitor at every fireside from the Atlantic to the Pacific and champion effectively the cause of loyalty and good government, and of justice to the soldiers and sailors of the late war, their widows, children and dependent relatives. How well this has been done is best indicated by the wonderful success of the paper, which has attained popularity and circulation more rapidly than any other in the history of American journalism.

A GREAT FAMILY NEWSPAPER

Features of the Paper.

The National Tribune makes a special feature of the history and reminiscences of the war for the preservation of the Nation. It publishes in fact the

of that gigantic struggle, for its history is not a warped and biased panegyric of some particular man or men, who are given credit for everything that succeeded. It is made up of the testimony of a multitude of witnesses, the plain, unvarnished stories of the men in every rank and degree who did the marching, digging and shooting and carried forward the war through all its various phases to a glorious success. The great value of the National Tribune's history is everywhere recognized, and its files are carefully preserved in every large library and historical collection in the country—North or South.

A fascinating story by Col. Thos. Knox, the brilliant writer of popular books, is now running in the paper.

An entertaining historical romance, by Frances Wilson (Fannie Williams), now appearing, is exciting great interest among the young folks with whom Miss Wilson has always been a great favorite.

Back numbers containing these will be furnished.

Very many distinguished men and women constantly contribute to its columns. It is favored in this way more than any other great weekly in the country.

John McElroy, who has written so much and so acceptably for the soldiers, will soon begin another war story.

Besides this it presents every week a splendid array of Editorials on Current Topics Stories by the Best Authors—Wit, Humor and Information—Agricultural Notes of the Greatest Value—Household Hints and Suggestions—Synopsis of the News of the Week—Answers to Correspondent—Bright Miscellany, etc., which will interest, amuse and instruct every member of the family.

CROOKSTON, Dec. 21, '88.

ED. JOURNAL: The article in your issue of Dec. 20th, headed "Does Not Believe in Third Party Foolishness," is a misapprehension. Sam Small DOES believe in the third party, as the inclosed letter to the Voice will explain. That article, purporting to be an extract from his Chickering Hall speech, is a gross misrepresentation, and Sam Small has since, both privately and publicly denounced it, but from the fact that it has been published from ocean to ocean and never corrected, except in the prohibition paper, I beg you in justice to your readers to correct the mistake. A PROHIBITIONIST.

SAM SMALL'S LETTER.

EDITOR VOICE: Some very uncalled-for remarks were made at Chickering Hall at the close of my address on "The Quick and the Dead of Prohibition," Lest there should arise further misapprehension of my position by those who were not present to hear my statement of it, I ask the courtesy of a brief space for these declarations, viz:

First, I did not say: "I do not believe in National Prohibition politics." I do believe in National Prohibition politics and in a National Prohibition party to propagate, realize and enforce them.

Second, I did not counsel an abandonment of our party organization. I counseled its more perfect and practical organization. I do not believe in sentimentalism in campaigning, but common sense, direct efforts at definite achievements, practically advancing the prohibition principle in public favor and progressive legislation. I believe we have lost much advantage for the prohibition principle in recent years in many localities by reason of our unwillingness to co-operate with non-party prohibitionists for the election of a real prohibitionist not a member of our party.

Third, I do not believe in any compromise of the principle of prohibition, and I do not advise co-operations, fusions or alliances with any man or party upon any other basis. In every such proposition the man and pledge must be for straight-out prohibition, and the character of the candidate must be the guarantee of his honest adherence to his pledges. In this event we could and would only be asked to vote for a candidate, not of our own making, upon his nomination by his own party upon its [the party's] pledge to the prohibition issue. I am not in favor of high license, regulation or restriction for the liquor traffic. But for its prohibition in city, county, state or nation. I am ready to co-operate with any and all honest men engaged for such purpose.

The above were the views, briefly put, that I argued before the audience at Chickering Hall. I am ready to stand up for their defense at any and all times. There is no "treason" in them to the principle of prohibition or to the national prohibition party. The audience agreed with them by demonstrations that could not be mistaken. My conscience approves my course; my mind is clear as to the future policy of our party; my faith sees, even if afar, the triumph of our principles and our party, if we are wise rather than windy, if we are sensible rather than sentimental Very truly,

Effects Homestead Entries.

Commissioner Stockslager Decides Approved Entries Cannot be Cancelled.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 10. - A large number of pre-emption and homestead cases, now pending in the general land office, were suspended several years ago by commissioner McFarland, and certain requirements made as to new proof or new notice. When these requirements were fulfilled, it was the caution to write a letter in such cases, stating that the entry was approved for patent. Commissionor Sparks, in many of these cases, made additional requirements and again suspended the entries. Commissioner Stockslager has recently decided that in all cases approved for patent, the commissioner has no power to recall that action, and he has ordered the suspended files in his office to be examined and all such cases tabulated for patent. It is supposed that this order will effect several thousand entries.

The above ruling of Commissioner Stockslager appears to be just and right, and will no doubt be appreciated by those parties who have had their entries suspended but have not as yet gone to the expense of second proof. But there seems to be no redress for those who have already advertised and made second proof along with being deprived of their patent from one to five years longer than they would have been providing the first proof was held good as it should have been.

If our Representatives to Congress from this and other districts would investigate this matter, and after being thoroughly convinced that an injustice, has been done the settler, introduce a bill for their benefit whereby they might realize enough out of the enormous surplus in the United States treasury to cover the cost of second proof, of which the settler has been deprived by an unjust and uncalled for ruling of the former commissioners, they would do a good thing for many poor settlers in this country.

CROOKSTON, Minn., Dec. 21, 1888.

ED. JOURNAL: I would like to make a little explanation through the columns of your paper in regard to an article that appeared in your issue of December 20th, entitled "Magnificent Mail Service." You say that a letter mailed at Stephen on Dec. 11th, addressed to THE JOURNAL, was received at your office on Dec. 13th. Our "cattle train," as you are pleased to call it, leaves Stephen at 6·25 p. m., and in my opinion there is just a possible chance that the letter in question might have been mailed in the P. O. at Stephen after 6·25 p. m., on Dec. 11th, in which case I would not receive the letter until Dec. 15th, and it would be distributed in the Crookston P. O. on the morning of the 13th. If the letter was dropped in the car, which you can tell by looking at the postmark, I am willing to acknowledge it an error on my part in misthrowing the letter.

Yours, respectfully,
POSTAL CLERK
On the "Cattle Train."

In relation to the above we interviewed the writer of the letter, who says he placed it in the Stephen post office, together with several others, about 4 p. m. We do not know what agent of the mail service is responsible, if any, but we are of the opinion that we should have received the letter very much sooner if the line north had proper train service.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, County of Polk.—ss.
In Probate Court. Special Term. December 24th, 1888.

In the matter of the estate of Margaret Barrette, deceased.

Whereas, An instrument in writing, purporting to be the last will and testament of Margaret Barrette, deceased, late of said county, has been delivered to this court.

And whereas, Joseph Barrette of said Polk County has filed therewith his petition, representing among other things, that said Margret Barrette died in said county on the fifth day of December 1888, testate, and that said petitioner is the sole executor named in said last will and testament, and praying that the said instrument may be admitted to probate, and that letters testamentary be to him issued thereon.

It is ordered, That the proofs of said instrument, and the said petition, be heard before this court, at the probate office in said county, on the 21st day of January A. D. 1888, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, when all concerned may appear and contest the probate of said instrument.

And it is further ordered, That public notice of the time and place of said hearing be given to all persons interested by publication of these orders for three weeks successively previous to said day of hearing, in THE POLK COUNTY JOURNAL, a newspaper printed and published at Crookston in said county.

By the Court.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Is one of the less than half-a-dozen really great family papers in the country.

IT IS THE ONLY ONE
Published at the National Capital.

IT IS THE ONLY ONE
Devoted to the history of the war.

IT IS THE ONLY ONE
Devoted to the interests of ex-soldiers and sailors.

IT IS THE ONLY ONE
That makes a bold and persistent fight for their rights.

IT IS THE ONLY ONE
That continually insists on justice being done the country's defenders.

It Has More Distinguished Contributors than Any Other Paper.

A Splendid 8-Page, 56-Column Paper.

Printed on fine paper, edited with signal ability and filled with the most interesting matter that can be procured.

ONLY $1 A YEAR—TWO CENTS A WEEK.

The National Tribune is the result of years of earnest, thoughtful effort, accompanied by a heavy expenditure of money, to build up at the Capital of the country which should be a welcome weekly visitor at every fireside from the Atlantic to the Pacific and champion effectively the cause of loyalty and good government, and of justice to the soldiers and sailors of the late war, their widows, children and dependent relatives. How well this has been done is best indicated by the wonderful success of the paper, which has attained popularity and circulation more rapidly than any other in the history of American journalism.

A GREAT FAMILY NEWSPAPER

Features of the Paper.

The National Tribune makes a special feature of the history and reminiscences of the war for the preservation of the Nation. It publishes in fact the

of that gigantic struggle, for its history is not a warped and biased panegyric of some particular man or men, who are given credit for everything that succeeded. It is made up of the testimony of a multitude of witnesses, the plain, unvarnished stories of the men in every rank and degree who did the marching, digging and shooting and carried forward the war through all its various phases to a glorious success. The great value of the National Tribune's history is everywhere recognized, and its files are carefully preserved in every large library and historical collection in the country—North or South.

A fascinating story by Col. Thos. Knox, the brilliant writer of popular books, is now running in the paper.

An entertaining historical romance, by Frances Wilson (Fannie Williams), now appearing, is exciting great interest among the young folks with whom Miss Wilson has always been a great favorite.

Back numbers containing these will be furnished.

Very many distinguished men and women constantly contribute to its columns. It is favored in this way more than any other great weekly in the country.

John McElroy, who has written so much and so acceptably for the soldiers, will soon begin another war story.

Besides this it presents every week a splendid array of Editorials on Current Topics Stories by the Best Authors—Wit, Humor and Information—Agricultural Notes of the Greatest Value—Household Hints and Suggestions—Synopsis of the News of the Week—Answers to Correspondents—Bright Miscellany, etc., which will interest, amuse and instruct every member of the family.

CROOKSTON, Dec. 21, '88.

ED. JOURNAL: The article in your issue of Dec, 20th, headed "Does Not Believe in Third Party Foolishness," is a misapprehension. Sam Small DOES believe in the third party, as the inclosed letter to the Voice will explain. That article, purporting to be an extract from his Chickering Hall speech, is a gross misrepresentation, and Sam Small has since, both privately and publicly denounced it, but from the fact that it has been published from ocean to ocean and never corrected, except in the prohibition paper, I beg you in justice to your readers to correct the mistake.

A PROHIBITIONIST.

SAM SMALL'S LETTER.

EDITOR VOICE: Some very uncalled-for remarks were made at Chickering Hall at the close of my address on "The Quick and the Dead of Prohibition." Lest there should arise further misapprehension of my position by those who were not present to hear my statement of it, I ask the courtesy of a brief space for these declarations, viz:

First, I did not say: "I do not believe in National Prohibition politics." I do believe in National Prohibition politics and in a National Prohibition party to propagate, realize and enforce them.

Second, I did not counsel an abandonment of our party organization. I counseled its more perfect and practical organization. I do not believe in sentimentalism in campaigning, but common sense, direct efforts at definite achievements, practically advancing the prohibition principle in public favor and progressive legislation. I believe we have lost much advantage for the prohibition principle in recent years in many localities by reason of our unwillingness to co operate with non-party prohibitionists for the election of a real prohibitionist not a member of our party.

Third, I do not believe in any compromise of the principle of prohibition, and I do not advise co-operations, fusions or alliances with any man or party upon any other basis. In every such proposition the man and pledge must be for straight-out prohibition, and the character of the candidate must be the guarantee of his honest adherence to his pledges. In this event we could and would only be asked to vote for a candidate, not of our own making, upon his nomination by his own party upon its [the party's] pledge to the prohibition issue. I am not in favor of high license, regulation or restriction for the liquor traffic. But for its prohibition in city, county, state or nation. I am ready to co-operate with any and all honest men engaged for such purpose.

The above were the views, briefly put, that I argued before the audience at Chickering Hall. I am ready to stand up for their defense at any and all times. There is no "treason" in them to the principle of prohibition or to the national prohibition party. The audience agreed with them by demonstrations that could not be mistaken. My conscience approves my course; my mind is clear as to the future policy of our party; my faith sees, even if afar, the triumph of our principles and our party, if we are wise rather than windy, if we are sensible rather than sentimental Very truly,

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

CROOKSTON, MINN., DECEMBER 27.

Concord (N. H.) Patriot. The Holstein cow "Shadeland Boom," from June 6th to July 6th (31 days) produced 125 pounds and 12 ounces of unsalted butter, or over four pounds per day. It required about fourteen pounds of milk (about seven quarts) to each pound of butter. During seven days of the time she produced a fraction less than thirty-two pounds of butter, and gave 400 pounds of milk. For two days she lacked only two ounces of producing five pounds of butter per day, which was made from 14.18 pounds of milk for each pound of butter.

These are the kind of facts about a cow of the Holstein breed, that the dairy world has been anxiously waiting for; and in our view such facts will do far more than the most copious milk records, per day, that any cow of the breed has made to commend the Holsteins. The cow that gives seventy pounds of milk that yields nearly five pounds of butter is a cow, worthy the name, besides one that gives over 100 pounds per day which only makes a little more than two pounds of butter, for the cows that yield most butter-fat per day, per month and per year, for the value of the food they consume, is the breed the Dairyman commends.

Disparaging the West.

Farm, Stock and Home: Eastern agricultural papers never miss an opportunity to say something disparaging of the west—something calculated to keep their farmers from emigrating from the stony hills of New England to the fertile plains and prairies nearer the setting sun. But they cannot at all times suppress the fact that there is abundant cause for the migration which is ever taking place. The following little clipping from a New England paper is a case in point:

"'There is no money in New Hampshire farming, and the most of us barely make the ends meet. I tell my wife we are just where we were when we started 37 years ago. We have the same farm. We had nothing else then, and we have nothing else now.' Such is the pathetic story of a New Hampshire farmer, which might be duplicated a thousand times, we presume, in all our New England States."

Consult Your Wife.

New York Tribune.

Two gentlemen were talking about a business enterprise in which, though it involved some pecuniary risk, they were strongly inclined to embark. Finally, one of them remarked: "I must consult my wife before I decide." "Why!" exclaimed the other, "is she boss?" "No" was the calm reply, "neither am I. We are a well matched team; and we don't drive tandem. My wife is as much interested in the welfare of our family as I, and she has a right to have a voice in the investment of our little property." There is nothing more than justice in this view of matrimonial obligation, especially in the case of poor or only moderately well-to-do families—and these comprise an overwhelmingly large proportion of the families in this country—where a slight increase or diminution of the annual earnings would be felt alike by every member. The wife, who has labored in the home to earn or to save, while the husband has labored in the field, the shop or the counting-room, is justly a partner in his earnings and their savings, and should share in all his plans of disposing of their small accumulations so as to make them more productive if all goes well.

But it is not the investment of money that troubles the great mass of people. The savings bank is sufficient for the little cash they have thought it wise to lay aside for emergencies. What accumulated capital they have is chiefly represented by more highly cultivated farms with reduced mortgages and improved buildings and stock, better workshops or enlarged stores. Upon these they must depend for their support and the education of their children. Each will ponder well, if he be wise, the question as to the proper course to pursue in order to render his accumulated capital, such as it is, most productive of good to himself and his family. The farmer may know well how to make the earth bring forth abundantly and fill his barns to bursting; but unwise laws may make his products valueless except for bare subsistence. Without a profitable market, money will be scarce or unknown, mortgages will eat up his farm, the shop and the village store will lose his custom and all will suffer together. His skill as a farmer will avail him little, if his wisdom as a voter, and that of many of his kind, be wanting.

We have spoken of the grange as an educator. In the grange the farmers of a whole neighborhood may consult as to their mutual interests, and, forgetting old party prejudices, unite in supporting the measures that will best advance their interests. And here the superiority of the grange over the primary meeting or the corner grocery council is apparent. Here farmers may consult with other farmers, and wives with other wives, and both with each other, and the general exchange of views tend to the advantage of all concerned. In a few weeks they are to decide how to invest their accumulated capital, and the women are not slightly interested in the result. They are likely to exert a conservative influence in the main; party success is of less consequence to them than the education and future prosperity of her children; they have read and thought and, on occasion, can talk. The Patrons of Husbandry will use their vast power more wisely for having taken their wives and daughters into the order.

Important to Lumbermen, and Others Employing Men in Camps.

I am instructed to ask your immediate attention to the necessity of knowing that the men you employ this winter are thoroughly protected by vaccination against small pox. This disease is again prevailing in places adjacent to the lines of travel both in Canada and the United States. It was brought directly through the Canadian quarantine to a township in this state last August, and resulted in eight cases and three deaths. To avoid the terrible experience of a few years ago, vaccination is the sure safeguard. It is as much for the benefit of the men as for yourselves and the people at large To be safe, therefore, re-vaccinate every one who has not had a successful vaccination within the last five years, and can show a good scar as evidence thereof.

Your foremen should keep a list of the men, in this respect, and should be on their guard against any eruptive disease appearing among them. Instruct them to isolate any one suspicious symptoms, with their clothing and bedding, till a medical opinion, or sufficient time shall develop their true character. I will advise any one of them, promptly, who will write me [for the purpose, and will be obliged for the earliest information of anything suspicious, that we may give assistance where needed.

Will you please acknowledge receipt of this circular and give your co-operation to the plan here suggested?

Address, Respectfully yours,

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of two hundred and eleven dollars and sixty cents, ($211.60,) principal and interest, due and which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by Emeline Henion, a widow, to Smith W. Fisk, bearing date the twelfth day of March A. D. 1887, and duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the eighteenth day of March A. D. 1887, at 11 o'clock and twenty-five minutes a. m., in book "29" of mortgages on pages 318 and 319, said mortgage was made to secure the payment of a promissory note of even date therewith, for the sum of two hundred dollars ($200.00,) payable on or before one year from the date thereof, made by said Emeline Henion, payable to said Smith W. Fisk or order and delivered by said mortgagor to said mortgagee at the date thereof, and whereas, the power of sale in said mortgage contained has become operative, and no action or proceedings at law or otherwise has been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, and the premises described in and covered by said mortgage, viz: Lots ten (10,) twelve (12) and fourteen (14,) in block three (3,) in Grand Forks East, according to the recorded plat thereof on file, and of record in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for said County of Polk and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances, said premises being situate in said County of Polk, will be sold at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest and ten dollars attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the costs and disbursements allowed by law, which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said County of Polk, at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said county and state, on the first day of February A. D. 1889, at 10 o'clock a. m., of that day, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated, December 3d, A. D. 1888.

A New State Issue.

Red Lake Reservation Will Add Six Thousand Square Miles to Minnesota.

All of Which is Valuable Land for the Purposes of Agriculture.

An Important Issue Which Has Been Overshadowed by the Sioux Reservation.

A Tract of Land Nearly as Large as the Entire State of Connecticut.

An Enormous Sum of Money to be Divided Among the Indians.

F. A. Carle, in Sunday Pioneer Press.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 22.—Six thousand square miles will be added to the public domain in Minnesota by the opening of the Red Lake Reservation and the consolidation of all the Chippewas at the White Earth and Red Lake agencies. This is half as much land as will be opened for settlement by the opening of the great Sioux reservation—and better land, too; yet the negotiations and registration for the opening of the Minnesota reservation have attracted comparatively little attention, while the Dakota project has been almost a national issue. Let us see how this opening is going to effect Minnesota and the Northwest generally. There are now about 7,400 square miles—to be more exact, 4,731,596 acres—included in Indian reservations in Minnesota. These are inhabited by about 7,500 Indians, allowing about a square mile to every adult and child. The measure about to go into effect will allot rather less than 1,000,000 acres in severalty to these 7,500 Indians, and open up the rest—about 6,000 square miles—to settlement under the homestead act and sale under the provisions of this act. At least three-quarters of this embraced in the great Red Lake Reservation is good agricultural land, prairie interspersed with timber, well watered and fertile.

ITS EXTENSIVE LIMITS.

This reservation stretches from White Earth north to the dominion boundary and from Marshall County east nearly to Rainy Lake. It is said to be fully equal for purposes of tillage to the land in the lower Red River Valley, which has been under profitable cultivation for generations. The entire reservation includes 3,200,000 acres. It will take less than 200,000 acres to meet the requirements of the severalty allotment provisions of the law. This will open about 3,000,000 acres of good farming land to entry and settlement. This is the feature of the pending measure of most general public interest. It opens four or five smaller reservations—about 400,000 acres in all—some of them having valuable pine, but this is chiefly of interest to lumbermen, who have kept themselves fully advised about the matter. I want to discuss the bill for the benefit of the settlers who have heard so much about pine and pine lands and pine rings in connection with it that they do not understand that it will open to the homestead entry and settlement a tract of agricultural land nearly as large as Connecticut. The Red Lake country is equal in attractiveness to some of the most fabulous parts of the Red River Valley that have been settled for years. It should be more inviting to the emigrant than the reservations recently opened in Montana, and stand an equal chance with the great Sioux reservation, which has a milder climate, but is said to be worse watered and less fertile.

ITS INDUCEMENTS TO IMMIGRATION.

I certainly look for another movement of emigration into Northern Minnesota as soon as this bill goes into effect, with the usual concomitants of railroad building, town planting and social evolution generally. If President Cleveland does not veto the bill passed by congress last session, it will become a law almost as soon as congress reassembles after the holiday recess. The senate made some slight amendments at the suggestion of Senator Davis. All these were agreed to by the house, except one providing that the agreement with the Indians contemplated by the bill must be ratified by congress. From this the senate receded, so full agreement was reached. The bill would have gone to the president this week but for the holiday adjournment. That does not leave time for engrossing it before the houses separate. It will be laid upon the president's table immediately upon the reassembling of congress, Jan. 2d, and there is no reason why he should not sign it at once. It is not favored by the Northwestern Indian commission, which is still in existence, but it meets the approval of Secretary Vilas, and is believed to be satisfactory to the people of the Northwest. The present bill has grown by successive recastings out of one introduced by Mr. Nelson in the Forty-eighth congress, and nearly passed through the house at that time under suspension of the rules. The bill itself has been printed a good many times. It provides for the cession and relinquishment of all the Indian reservations in Minnesota in return for the allotment to all the Indians now occupying them of lands in severalty under the act of 1887. This secures 160 acres to each adult and orphan and eighty acres to each minor child. It is estimated that the allotment will average about 100 acres for each of the 7,500 Indians in the state. These allotments are all to be made within the limits of White Earth agency, to which all the tribes are to be removed except the 1,100 Indians at Red Lake, who are to receive allotments on their own reservation. This will wind up all the agencies except these two and open to the market all the pine land reservations on the Mississippi and eastward. A commission is provided to consist of three persons, one a citizen of Minnesota, to secure the consent of the Indians to the cession, make an enumeration of the provisions if consent is obtained.

REQUIREMENTS NECESSARY.

The consent of two-thirds of the adults on each reservation, except Red Lake, is necessary to the cession of that reservation, and the consent of two-thirds of all the adults on all the reservations is necessary to the cession of the Red Lake Reservation, which is regarded as the common property of all. Once ceded, these lands are to be disposed of for the benefit of the Indians. They are to be divided into pine and agricultural lands under the supervision of the land office. The former are to be appraised upon personal examination at the rate of not less than $3 per 1,000 feet for the standing pine, board measure, and are to be sold at auction from time to time in forty-acre tracts for not less than the appraised value. The agricultural lands are to be open to settlement under the homestead act, except that the homesteader pays $1.25 per acre in five annual installments and cannot commute or in any way gain title before the expiration of the five years. It is estimated that the lands to be opened for settlement will divide roughly into 300,000,000 acres of agricultural and 750,000 acres of more or less valuable pine, and that the complete proceeds from the sale will be from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000. This is a good deal of money to divide among 7,500 Indians and their descendants, even after paying the expenses of the commission, surveys and sale. The actual division of money is to take place after fifty years, contrary to the usual provision in such cases. In the meantime the proceeds of sales are to be invested at 5 per cent. one-fourth of the income expended in maintaining schools for the Indians, and three-fourths paid to them in the form of farming utensils, supplies and money annuities. This is a much more liberal provision than that proposed for the Dakota Sioux, and it is believed that it will be acceptable to the Minnesota Indians. Should the bill become a law this session, it is thought the commission will be appointed and the work of obtaining signatures begun next summer.

An Iowa Man for the Speakership.

Daily Pioneer Press.

GALENA, Ill., Special Telegram Dec. 22—A prominent Iowa Republican politician from Dubuque stopped over in this city to-day on his way home from Washington, where he has been since the opening of congress, and being interviewed stated, among other things, that the candidacy of Gen. D. B. Henderson of his district for the speakership of the next house of congress was a fixed fact, and that the entire party machinery of his state would be used in bringing about his election, if possible. "The general," he said "has for many years been a central figure in state and national politics, and has long been one of the foremost leaders in the house of representatives. His personal popularity and experience in congressional life, his thorough knowledge of parliamentary law, and the fact that he is a one-legged Union ex-soldier will help him materially in the race for the speakership of the next house of congress, which he has already vigorously inaugurated. Besides, there has never been a speaker west of Indiana, and it is high time the great Mississippi valley, with its growing interests and reliable voting state should have recognition."

Rochester Democrat: If the democratic papers had been as frank with Cleveland before election as they have been since he would have learned numberless things to his advantage.

CURRENT OPINION.

Pittsburg Dispatch: The real complaint of the seceders from the G. A. R. in Indiana and Illinois is not that it was used as a political machine against them, but that it could not be used as a political machine in their favor.

Detroit Tribune: A great deal is being said about Gen. Harrison's "Southern Policy." He hasn't outlined it as yet, but we can tell you what one of its principal points will be. It will be "fair play." Now, if everybody wants to rear and strike at that let him proceed and rear.

Denver Republican: It would be nothing more than right if the country west of the Missouri River were to be represented in the cabinet. It has not been well treated by the present administration, and it is, therefore, all the more desirous of securing just treatment from the one which will be begun the 4th of next March.

St. Louis Republic: Congressman Oates talks of so amending the federal constitution as to make only white males over 21 years of age qualified for suffrage, but "revolutions never go backward." This country must go on to the end of its experiment and pull itself together as best it can after the result. "The wine is darwn; it must be drank."

Arizona Star: Word comes from Phenix that they have got it bad at Garden City. Six candidates for postmaster, three for United States marshal, five for district attorney and the same chaps will take district judgeship, three for governor, two for secretary, and nearly everybody wants the surveyor general's office. They say anybody can fill that office now. The minor offices they propose to let the remainder of the territory have. Now who will say the "Cochise colony is asleep?"

Boston Herald: We fear Judge Gresham never will be president. He He certainly will not until there is a revolution in the kind of men who compose nominating conventions. The latest exhibition of the judge's old-fashioned citizenship is in his rebuke of the bribery that has just been rampant in the state of Indiana. The Judge does not content himself with objecting to the small fry who dispense the money in the business. He strikes right out at the head-center who organized corruption and directed its applications in "blocks of five." No, Judge Gresham will be a more unpopular candidate now than ever.

Philadelphia Telegraph: A somewhat alarming report comes from the Nor' nor' west. It is that the true source of the Mississippi has been discovered. The true source of the so-called Father of waters has been discovered more times than you can shake a stick at already; but every now and then some fellow who has nothing particular to do paddles his miserable little canoe up some by-creek and comes out on a pond that nobody has ever heard of outside of a radius of half a mile from from it, and then sets to work to getting up a geographical excitement by declaring that he has solved a problem that has baffled all previous explorers This thing is getting to be something in the nature of a nuisance.

State Press.

Brainerd Tribune: The contest over the speakership of the next legislature is both lively and interesting. The big Fifth, however, seems to have the inside track.

Fergus Falls Journal: It looks now as if the Fifth district would be practically solid for C. H. Graves for speaker. Both Washburn and Sabin are supporting him in this section.

Duluth Herald: Senator Sabin expresses the greatest confidence in his re-election and it is a noticeable fact that the Washburn men have lost confidence in the success of their candidate since Mr. Sabin has appeared personally in St. Paul.

Todd County Argus: The speakership of the next legislature has narrowed down to a three cornered contest between C. H. Graves, of Duluth, J. O. Flynn, of Little Falls and Mr. Morgan of the southern part of the state. As between Mr. Flynn and Mr. Graves location would incline us to the former, but we regard Mr. Graves as the ablest man of the three.

Todd County Argus: The press of the state is not as strongly in favor of Washburn for senator as one would suppose by the daily papers of St. Paul and Minneapolis. Mr. Washburn is certainly an able man and qualified so far as ability is concerned, to fill the place, but he hasn't got wings......We are not particularly opposed to Mr. Washburn, but we are unable to see any very great service that he has done this state by which he has earned the senatorship. The present encumbent, Mr. Sabin, stands high in the party and is as able a man as Mr. Washburne.

Duluth Tribune: Colonel C. H. Graves has returned from a prolonged visit to St. Paul. The Colonel is not talking very much about his chances for speaker. In fact, Colonel Graves does not care to talk much about himself at any time, but he works whether it is business or pleasure. It is said that the colonel's chances are very fair for election to the speakership. He has all the necessary qualifications for the position. He is a good parliamentarian; he has had considerable experience in the legislature; he is a man of a cool, judicial cast of mind, a man of business and above all a gentleman in the highest sense of the word.

Duluth Tribune: The result of the speakership fight in the coming session of the legislature is no longer a matter of conjecture.. Col. C. H. Graves, of this city, is far and away ahead of all other aspirants and his strength in the southern part of the state is daily increasing.

CHANCES DAILY GROWING BETTER.

Norman County Index: Senator Sabin's chances of re-election are growing better all the time.

DEVOTED TO THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

Stillwater Gazette: Of course the Gazette is decidedly in favor of the re-election of Hon. Sabin to the United States senate. He has been a faithful servant to the people, he has introduced measures of reform that are of great importance to the whole country, and, as a matter of custom and courtesy, we think he is entitled to the endorsement of a second term. No man can be elected from this state who is more devoted to the republican party and country, and no man from this state stands above Hon. Sabin in securing legislation for his own state.

OCCUPIES A DISTINGUISHED PLACE.

Motley Register: A preference for Senator Sabin does not necessarily involve hatred for Mr. Washburn, or any other candidate; and while we believe that it will be best for our state to return Sen. Sabin to the United States senate, we have no desire to belittle the qualifications or republicanism of his opponents. Sen. Sabin has served Minnesota for six years, and has performed this service in an able manner. He has been under fire a considerable portion of the time, owing to business adversity, but this has not caused him to neglect the interests of his constituents. During this period he occupied a distinguished place in republican councils, and he is now in position to serve us better than ever. It is well known that he and Sen. Davis are in hearty accord upon public questions, and their united work during the succeeding six years will accomplish much toward placing Minnesota in the front rank among her sister states. It is also as well known, that the senator enjoys the friendship and confidence of President-elect Harrison, and that their relations are very close and cordial, having extended through a series of years These considerations, together will many others, unite in causing us to hope that our legislature will decide to choose Senator Sabin as his own successor.

NOTHING URGED AGAINST MR. SABIN.

Verndale Journal: There is no reason in the demand made by Minneapolis that the senator should be chosen from among her millionaires. There is just as good senatorial timber in several outside localities, and the people, of the state have an earnest desire to see the scepter depart from the little coterie of politicians who have claimed the control of matters political for the past decade or more. Nothing is urged against Senator Sabin being his own successor, except that a few citizens of Minneaolis do not want him, and that a few democrats in the legislature voted for him when he was elected six years ago. He has signified his willingness to measure swords with his opponent Washburn in the republican caucus and now his enemies have no chance to assail him except by inspiring an insignificant city daily without influence or following to assert that Senator Davis ought not to enjoy and express the hope that his colleague should be returned to the senate. Out upon such nonsense! Senator Sabin is a good republican and good republicans will vote for him to remain in his present position six years longer.

HIS RECORD PARTICULARLY GOOD.

Wadena Pioneer: It is not absolutely necessary that a president of a railroad corporation should be elected United States senator from Minnesota. The farmers do not care to have such a man sent to the senate to look after their interests. Sabin is not connected with any railway corporation and should be elected to succeed himself in the United States senate.

THE STAMPEDE TO SABIN.

Rushford Star: Public sentiment in this section since the senatorial fight narrowed down to Sabin and Washburn has become considerably Sabinized, and from present indications a stampede of the legislative members to Sabin would almost universal approval.

SABIN STEADILY GAINING.

Preston Republican: There is a decided increase in the Sabin forces. The opposition to concentrating political power, as would the election of Mr. Washburn, is gowing immensely. Men from all parts of the state are becoming alarmed at the possibility that they may be made the "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for a gigantic combine.

A New State Issue.

Red Lake Reservation Will Add Six Thousand Square Miles to Minnesota.

All of Which is Valuable Land for the Purposes of Agriculture.

An Important Issue Which Has Been Overshadowed by the Sioux Reservation.

A Tract of Land Nearly as Large as the Entire State of Connecticut.

An Enormous Sum of Money to be Divided Among the Indians.

F. A. Carle, in Sunday Pioneer Press.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 22.—Six thousand square miles will be added to the public domain in Minnesota by the opening of the Red Lake Reservation and the consolidation of all the Chippewas at the White Earth and Red Lake agencies. This is half as much land as will be opened for settlement by the opening of the great Sioux reservation—and better land, too; yet the negotiations and registration for the opening of the Minnesota reservation have attracted comparatively little attention, while the Dakota project has been almost a national issue. Let us see how this opening is going to effect Minnesota and the Northwest generally. There are now about 7,400 square miles—to be more exact, 4,731,596 acres—included in Indian reservations in Minnesota. These are inhabited by about 7,500 Indians, allowing about a square mile to every adult and child. The measure about to go into effect will allot rather less than 1,000,000 acres in severalty to these 7,500 Indians, and open up the rest—about 6,000 square miles—to settlement under the homestead act and sale under the provisions of this act. At least three-quarters of this embraced in the great Red Lake Reservation is good agricultural land, prairie interspersed with timber, well watered and fertile.

ITS EXTENSIVE LIMITS.

This reservation stretches from White Earth north to the dominion boundary and from Marshall County east nearly to Rainy Lake. It is said to be fully equal for purposes of tillage to the land in the lower Red River Valley, which has been under profitable cultivation for generations. The entire reservation includes 3,200,000 acres. It will take less than 200,000 acres to meet the requirements of the severalty allotment provisions of the law. This will open about 3,000,000 acres of good farming land to entry and settlement. This is the feature of the pending measure of most general public interest. It opens four or five smaller reservations—about 400,000 acres in all—some of them having valuable pine, but this is chiefly of interest to lumbermen, who have kept themselves fully advised about the matter. I want to discuss the bill for the benefit of the settlers who have heard so much about pine and pine lands and pine rings in connection with it that they do not understand that it will open to the homestead entry and settlement a tract of agricultural land nearly as large as Connecticut. The Red Lake country is equal in attractiveness to some of the most fabulous parts of the Red River Valley that have been settled for years. It should be more inviting to the emigrant than the reservations recently opened in Montana, and stand an equal chance with the great Sioux reservation, which has a milder climate, but is said to be worse watered and less fertile.

ITS INDUCEMENTS TO IMMIGRATION.

I certainly look for another movement of emigration into Northern Minnesota as soon as this bill goes into effect, with the usual concomitants of railroad building, town planting and social evolution generally. If President Cleveland does not veto the bill passed by congress last session, it will become a law almost as soon as congress reassembles after the holiday recess. The senate made some slight amendments at the suggestion of Senator Davis. All these were agreed to by the house, except one providing that the agreement with the Indians contemplated by the bill must be ratified by congress. From this the senate receded, so full agreement was reached. The bill would have gone to the president this week but for the holiday adjournment. That does not leave time for engrossing it before the houses separate. It will be laid upon the president's table immediately upon the reassembling of congress, Jan. 2d, and there is no reason why he should not sign it at once. It is not favored by the Northwestern Indian commission, which is still in existence, but it meets the approval of Secretary Vilas, and is believed to be satisfactory to the people of the Northwest. The present bill has grown by successive recastings out of one introduced by Mr. Nelson in the Forty-eighth congress, and nearly passed through the house at that time under suspension of the rules. The bill itself has been printed a good many times. It provides for the cession and relinquishment of all the Indian reservations in Minnesota in return for the allotment to all the Indians now occupying them of lands in severalty under the act of 1887. This secures 160 acres to each adult and orphan and eighty acres to each minor child. It is estimated that the allotment will average about 100 acres for each of the 7,500 Indians in the state. These allotments are all to be made within the limits of White Earth agency, to which all the tribes are to be removed except the 1,100 Indians at Red Lake, who are to receive allotments on their own reservation. This will wind up all the agencies except these two and open to the market all the pine land reservations on the Mississippi and eastward. A commission is provided to consist of three persons, one a citizen of Minnesota, to secure the consent of the Indians to the cession, make an enumeration of the provisions if consent is obtained.

REQUIREMENTS NECESSARY.

The consent of two-thirds of the adults on each reservation, except Red Lake, is necessary to the cession of that reservation, and the consent of two-thirds of all the adults on all the reservations is necessary to the cession of the Red Lake Reservation, which is regarded as the common property of all. Once ceded, these lands are to be disposed of for the benefit of the Indians. They are to be divided into pine and agricultural lands under the supervision of the land office. The former are to be appraised upon personal examination at the rate of not less than $3 per 1,000 feet for the standing pine, board measure, and are to be sold at auction from time to time in forty-acre tracts for not less than the appraised value. The agricultural lands are to be open to settlement under the homestead act, except that the homesteader pays $1.25 per acre in five annual installments and cannot commute or in any way gain title before the expiration of the five years. It is estimated that the lands to be opened for settlement will divide roughly into 300,000,000 acres of agricultural and 750,000 acres of more or less valuable pine, and that the complete proceeds from the sale will be from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000. This is a good deal of money to divide among 7,500 Indians and their descendants, even after paying the expenses of the commission, surveys and sale. The actual division of money is to take place after fifty years, contrary to the usual provision in such cases. In the meantime the proceeds of sales are to be invested at 5 per cent. one-fourth of the income expended in maintaining schools for the Indians, and three-fourths paid to them in the form of farming utensils, supplies and money annuities. This is a much more liberal provision than that proposed for the Dakota Sioux, and it is believed that it will be acceptable to the Minnesota Indians. Should the bill become a law this session, it is thought the commission will be appointed and the work of obtaining signatures begun next summer.

An Iowa Man for the Speakership.

Daily Pioneer Press.

GALENA, Ill., Special Telegram Dec. 22—A prominent Iowa Republican politician from Dubuque stopped over in this city to-day on his way home from Washington, where he has been since the opening of congress, and being interviewed stated, among other things, that the candidacy of Gen. D. B. Henderson of his district for the speakership of the next house of congress was a fixed fact, and that the entire party machinery of his state would be used in bringing about his election, if possible. "The general," he said "has for many years been a central figure in state and national politics, and has long been one of the foremost leaders in the house of representatives. His personal popularity and experience in congressional life, his thorough knowledge of parliamentary law, and the fact that he is a one-legged Union ex-soldier will help him materially in the race for the speakership of the next house of congress, which he has already vigorously inaugurated. Besides, there has never been a speaker west of Indiana, and it is high time the great Mississippi valley, with its growing interests and reliable voting state should have recognition."

Rochester Democrat: If the democratic papers had been as frank with Cleveland before election as they have been since he would have learned numberless things to his advantage.

CURRENT OPINION.

Pittsburg Dispatch: The real complaint of the seceders from the G. A. R. in Indiana and Illinois is not that it was used as a political machine against them, but that it could not be used as a political machine in their favor.

Detroit Tribune: A great deal is being said about Gen. Harrison's "Southern Policy." He hasn't outlined it as yet, but we can tell you what one of its principal points will be. It will be "fair play." Now, if everybody wants to rear and strike at that let him proceed and rear.

Denver Republican: It would be nothing more than right if the country west of the Missouri River were to be represented in the cabinet. It has not been well treated by the present administration, and it is, therefore, all the more desirous of securing just treatment from the one which will be begun the 4th of next March.

St. Louis Republic: Congressman Oates talks of so amending the federal constitution as to make only white males over 21 years of age qualified for suffrage, but "revolutions never go backward." This country must go on to the end of its experiment and pull itself together as best it can after the result. "The wine is darwn; it must be drank."

Arizona Star: Word comes from Phenix that they have got it bad at Garden City. Six candidates for postmaster, three for United States marshal, five for district attorney and the same chaps will take district judgeship, three for governor, two for secretary, and nearly everybody wants the surveyor general's office. They say anybody can fill that office now. The minor offices they propose to let the remainder of the territory have. Now who will say the "Cochise colony is asleep?"

Boston Herald: We fear Judge Gresham never will be president. He He certainly will not until there is a revolution in the kind of men who compose nominating conventions. The latest exhibition of the judge's old-fashioned citizenship is in his rebuke of the bribery that has just been rampant in the state of Indiana. The Judge does not content himself with objecting to the small fry who dispense the money in the business. He strikes right out at the head-center who organized corruption and directed its applications in "blocks of five." No, Judge Gresham will be a more unpopular candidate now than ever.

Philadelphia Telegraph: A somewhat alarming report comes from the Nor' nor' west. It is that the true source of the Mississippi has been discovered. The true source of the so-called Father of waters has been discovered more times than you can shake a stick at already; but every now and then some fellow who has nothing particular to do paddles his miserable little canoe up some by-creek and comes out on a pond that nobody has ever heard of outside of a radius of half a mile from from it, and then sets to work to getting up a geographical excitement by declaring that he has solved a problem that has baffled all previous explorers This thing is getting to be something in the nature of a nuisance.

State Press.

Brainerd Tribune: The contest over the speakership of tha next legislature is both lively and interesting. The big Fifth, however, seems to have the inside track.

Fergus Falls Journal: It looks now as if the Fifth district would be practically solid for C. H. Graves for speaker. Both Washburn and Sabin are supporting him in this section.

The C. O. D. Clothing House sell more goods in their line than all the stores in the city combined.

On Friday evening the Salmagundi Club entertained a number of invited guests, at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Wheeler. The following program was listened to by an appreciative audience: Three Bishers, song and tableau, Mr. Wheeler, Mr. and Mrs. McKee, Mr. Kelso, Miss Minnie Ayers, Mr. Hart and Miss Maggie Brown. Arrangements for this number had been carefully made and it was, perhaps, the most perfect of the evening. Next was a piano duett by Mrs. Wheeler and Miss Ayers, which was well received. The tableau, "An Artist at Work in his Studio," called forth admiring remarks from the audience. Miss Nettie Brown and Mr. Crawford were the characters. Miss Minnie Ayers sang in her usual brilliant style, accompanied by piano and flute. Then came the fun-inspiring number of the program, a shadow pantomine—"Mary Jane." Miss Ayers made a great success as "Mary Jane," while Mr. Hart, as "Lord Mortimer," threw the audience into convulsions of merriment with his majestic attitudes. Mell Milne took the part of "Benjamin" and was frightened by a cow of alarming proportions. Miss Clara Aaker sang a selected solo, and charmed her hearers as she always does. The closing number was a tableau—"Love in Leap Year," by Miss Aaker and Mr. Crawford, who did so well that the desired effect of a closing scene was realized and the company found itself in admirable spirits for a good social time. The ladies of the club soon betook themselves to the culinary regions, from whence soon emerged such an amount of good things to the taste, by way of pop-corn-balls and candy, (the fruits of faithful work by the aforementioned ladies, earlier in the day) as to occupy the attention of all present for some time. After a very pleasant hour of informal talk and merry-making the company departed, each face wearing an expression, gratifying to the members of the club. Below we give a list of the guests: Mr. and Mrs. Erskine, Mr. and Mrs. Ayers, Mr. and Mrs. Vance, Prof. and Mrs. Moore, Mr. and Mrs. Sawyer, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Mix, Mr. and Mrs. Cahoon, Mr. and Mrs. Hitchcock, Mr. and Mrs. Milne, Mrs. A. Brown, Mrs. Elmer, Miss Moore and Miss Brown.

The Young People's Alliance of the M. E. church held a scripture and song service, New Year's eve, which was well attended. At its close a social was held, followed during the last hour of the old year by a watch service. Rev. Nicholson, of Ada, was present and gave a brief but very interesting address.

Alfred D. White, one of the typographical fraternity, arrived in the city on Monday. He had been in Minneapolis trying to secure work, but without success, so he struck for this section where he found work without difficulty. The northwest is not so slow in any respect as many older portions of the country.

Rev. Chas. Carroll, gathered a group of his neighbors about him on New Year's day, all attired in summer wraps, fans, parasols, etc., while one of the artists of the city took a "winter scene in northern Minnesota." It is rumored that the gentlemen of the party were obliged to remove their dusters to obscure certain patches of snow, but as it was one who was not in the group, (but wished he had been) who suggested it, we are tempted to say it was a case of "sour grapes."

The "noble red man," confined in the county jail on charge of store-breaking at Thief River Falls, is making the most of his advantages in learning, from a fellow prisoner, the art of writing, etc. He already takes pride in the accomplishment of writing his name in legible characters, and we imagine his many friends on the Reserve will be green with envy when, released from his present quarters, he exhibits his skill in the chiographic art. Our advice to him would be to throw over the tomahawk and devote his future time to professional card-writing among his tribe.

Two men, transacting business in this city, were settling an account. No. 2 gave No. 1 a dollar bill in change. No. 1, with a grimace, said: "What did you give me that for? I promised to give my wife every dollar bill I received!" Later, No. 2 in looking over the account, finding he had received a dollar exceeding his just dues, proceeded to the bank, exchanged a silver dollar for paper, sought No. 1 and remarked: "You gave me a dollar too much on that deal, I'll pay you now!" and going into the depths of his pocket, drew forth the paper. No. 1 hasn't decided yet whether to challenge No. 2 to meet him in deadly combat, keep the matter hushed up, or tell the joke on himself.

On the night of the 31st, before the coming in of the New Year, a meteor crossed the southern sky, so brilliant as to light for an instant, the whole landscape. Was there something suggestive in this, at the time of the going out of an old year?

Fleet footman of a dying year,
Against night's darkened sky,
Appearing—instantly to disappear.
Before man's startled eye:
Why do we watch with bated breath
Thy flight o'er heaven's steep;
Then let Time's silent wheels of death
Glide by. nor break our sleep?
For not more swift thy passing by,
Than race the steeds of time—
A sudden start, a dazzled eye—
Then final midnight's chime.

How do the few papers in the Fifth District that still support Washburn like he action of the Washburn managers in trying to down our candidate for speaker, Col. Graves? On Friday, the little daughter of Express Agent Dyer, after a brief illness, passed the border land, leaving her parents to mourn that their treasure should so soon be taken from them. The sincere sympathy of their many friends is with them in their deep affliction.

At 4 o'clock on New Years morning, Mr. Charles Wright, who for some days had been confined to his bed by consumption, passed into rest, surrounded by his family, who mourn the loss of a loving husband and father. The funeral took place today at the residence of the deceased, at 11 o'clock.

Warren Register: Bro. Cooke of THE POLK COUNTY JOURNAL was in Warren on Friday and gave us a friendly grip. He went over the senatorial question pro and con, and left us impressed with the idea that he was rather in favor of Sabin getting there, unless a Duluth man or some one up this way can be elected, which is hardly probable.

On New Years day, while assisting a lady from his carriage, at the Sherman house, Pat Conners' team took fright from a passing locomotive and started to run, crossing diagonally across the street, they dashed between Herb's and the city scales, and then up Main street at a terrible rate of speed, meeting a buggy, in which a lady was riding, on the hill, they struck the vehicle with such force that the lady was thrown to the ground, but escaped injury. Passing over the hill, they took a circuitous route to the northeast, returned to town, and ran into Alderman & Sylvester's livery stable on Ash street breaking the buggy pole, and two spokes from one wheel.

New Years Doings.

Never in the history of the city were New Years customs observed as on Tuesday. All during the afternoon, the streets in the residence portion of the city were lively with the whirl of wheels and the interchange of New Years salutations among the gentlemen as they went about calling at the respective homes of the ladies who kept open houses. We give below, a list of ladies who received, together with those who assisted them:

Mrs. J. A. Bemis.

Mrs. C. F. Mix, assisted by Mesdames Stevens and Stearns.

Mrs. Auglim assisted by Mesdames Dampier, Thorsen, Gravel, Misses Maggie Brown and Lottie Anglim.

Mrs. Ayers, assisted by Mesdames Erskine, Vance, Wheeler, McKee, Misses Erskine, Aaker, Moore, Mamie and Minnie Ayers.

Mrs. Sawyer, assisted by Mesdames Jennings, Copeland, Misses Campbell, Edith Copeland, Mimim Fontaine.

Mrs. Fortier, assisted by Mesdames J. W. Harmon, J. Wood.

Mrs. A. A. Miller, assisted by Mesdames Fuller and Dawley.

Mrs. Wile, assisted by Mesdames Durand, Rosenthal, Alexander, Misses Mix.

The following gentlemen went out together; Rev. Carroll, Medlar and Fortin.

Messrs. Wile, Winnie, Alexander, Rosenthal, Adams.

Messrs. Graves, Grey and Walker.

Messrs. Anglim, Gravel, Dampier, Thorsen and Hertz.

Altogether it was an enjoyable day to all who participated in its enjoyments.

M. R. BROWN.

BABEL, Polk Co., Minn., Dec. 31.

ED. JOURNAL: Christmas has come and gone, with the finest kind of weather for this season of the year, and it looks as if it will continue until we pass over to the unknown 1889. I thought of sending you a New Year's present, but remembering that I owed you for the next year's subscription on the paper, I concluded to send you it, which, no doubt, will be as much appreciated as a—doll, or something of that kind.

I would like to say a few words about the strife for U. S. Senator. I believe that we want a man that is not only willing to free us from that heavy burdon, Grover Cleveland, but is also willing to take off some of that still heavier burden—taxation. In other words we want a man that honestly will work for a tariff tax reduction. We have such men in Knute Nelson, Gordon E. Cole, and others. I hope that our senators and representatives in the legislature can easily see that we, as farmers especially, can't spare Mr. Washburn, as we want him at Minneapolis to fix the grade on our wheat, or we will have no grade at all by-and-by.

You may wonder where Babel is in Polk County. Well, I shall not tell you this time, but according to our local newspaper of late, "Babel" will answer better for the place than any other name I can think of just now,

Wishing you a Happy New Year, I r emain, yours, truly,

A FARMER.

Corrispondence Fertile Journal.

As I have just came back from Crookston. where the seat of justice for this our county, is located, I would like to tell many of your readers that were not there how things seemed to be run.

First: The Court was filled to overflowing with evil-doers and justice-seekers. They were busy and bustling about back and forth in the court room, and attorneys, judge and jurors were doing all they could to wind up business. All seemed to be satisfactorily settled, but pistol-shooters and saloon-frequenters seemed to have the poorest show to have the judge's and jury's sympathy, and that shows that our district has a sound thinking populace, and above all a No 1 good judge, with a clear and brilliant understanding of all cases and matters that came before him. Judge Mills is a good one.

Crookston is of course profiting by this court, and all the hotels seems to be filled with people; but of them all none were as full as the Sherman house, which was crowded to the uttermost of its capacity.

The populace from the so-called Thirteen Towns is now in a kind of booming fever and is also helping to keep Crookston up. Crookston is like an olden city and a Queen between the many Waters and the seventy or more townships, constituting the empire of our great Polk County.

May peace and prosperity from the Almighty rest upon this community and the whole land.

P. H. STROMME.

KING CARNIVAL.

King Carnival will hold his annual festival in the fourth year of his reign at his Ice Palace of the north land, at St. Paul, Minnesota, beginning January 23d and ending February 1st, 1889.

The St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway, for the accommodation of their patrons, will sell tickets at very low rates from all points on their lines to St. Paul on and between the dates given above.

Preparations are being made on a scale commensurate with the importance of this great event, for an entertainment on a scale heretofore unequalled by previous carnivals.

There will be grand processions of the various Toboggan clubs loyal subjects to his royal highness, King Carnival, during the carnival.

The magnificent Ice Palace, to be erected near the banks of the Father of the Waters, the Mississippi, will be constructed on a more elaborate plan and on a scale of grandeur never before attempted. All Carnival clubs in the Northwest will attend the grand storming of the Ice Palace which takes place during the Carnival. There will be Ski races hotly contested by the various Scandinavian Ski Clubs, while the Sons of Old Scotia will meet in friendly rivalry on the Curling Grounds.

For further information apply to your St. P., M. & M. Ticket Agent, or F. I. Whitney, General Passenger and Ticket Agent, St. Paul, Minn.

The Cap Sheaf.

The great dailies of St. Paul and Minneapolis all tried their hands at a holiday edition on Christmas day and got out very creditable sheets, but, on New Years day comes the Minneapolis Tribune with the cap sheaf in form of a regular 16 page magazine with beautiful covers. It is the handsomest and best gotten up holiday edition that has come to our table during this holiday season.

About Fast Walking.

Orange Judd Farmer.

Walking is healthful for man or woman. It exercises nearly all the muscles of the body, and produces a free circulation of the blood, and good digestion—all so necessary to a sound condition. If American women of all classes would walk only as much as English ladies do, it would promote the health and vigor of the present generation of women, and the next generation of both sexes would be far stronger and more healthful. If we were back to boyhood, with our present knowledge and observation, we would cultivate our locomotive energies with a great deal of care. By practice, begun early in life most persons can acquire the ability to walk four or five miles an hour with ease, and "do" 40 to 60 miles a day without exhaustion or great fatigue. Unfortunately for the writer, he became prejudiced against walking by spending so much of his boyhood and youth in harrowing. The man held the plows; the boys followed the harrow in its endless, slow, monotonous, lonesome rounds, very irksome to an active mind, ambitious for something to exercise skill and brains upon, The walking muscles were exercised, but the slow gait in driving the team in "dragging," as harrowing was then called became a fixed habit by the time manhood was reached. We mention this for the benefit of the present boys, and their fathers too. For most farm work a horse whose natural gait is 3½ to 4 miles an hour is worth double one which has to be constantly urged and goaded to make 3 miles. A team before a wagon going to church or to mill, or to market, or before a load of grain, and particularly before the plow and harrow, which goes 3½ to 4 miles an hour, will accomplish a great deal more in a day or week then the slow gaited one, and will do it with less exhaustion, if care be taken to give frequent short "breathing spells," after driving rapidly on a walk, or trot or gallop. Give a brief "breathing spell" every mile or so, to relax the strained muscles but for a moment and the horse will be less exhausted at the end of a journey than the other team, which is kept on a steady unbroken jog or pull at only half the speed.

A MAN WALKING 105½ MILES DAILY.

While the "walking matches," so much in vogue, are a nuisance, and more or less demoralizing, they indirectly do some good by demonstrating what can be done by cultivating and exercising the muscles. In the match in New York, two weeks since, the men who started in at 12 o'clock Monday morning, and continued until 10 p. m. Saturday, there were no less than ten who made a distance of over 528 miles. Two of them walked in this time over 600 miles. The champion in the match, Littlewood, traveled 623½ in five days and 22 hours or an average of 105½ miles for each 24 hours. This feat has never been equaled, so far as is known. Much more speed has been attained for short spurts, and for distances of 50 to 100 miles, but in this case the man walked an average of 105½ miles for each of six successive days. Most will remember how much excitement there was when, but a very short time ago, it was announced that a man had walked 500 miles in the course of a week. But here we have half a score of men, not only exceeding this distance, but two of them adding more than 100 miles to it.

Miss Pickerell's Window

“If I can ever afford to do it I'm going to have a nice big bay window just in there where them two nasty little windows are.”

Miss Clarinda Pickerell's friends had heard her make this remark over and over again. Often she added:

“I do think a bay window is one of the nicest things in the world. They're so nice to set in: You can see so much from'em. And how nice they are for plants. I've planned it all out time and ag'in jest how I'd fit my bay window up if ever the Lord let me have one.

“I'd have my geraniums and callas and heliotrope and oxalis and begonia and fuschias and my wand'rin' Jew and ivy all in that window. Then I'd have my bird-cage hanging from the center, and mebby some day I could get me a gold fish in one of them glass pots to set on a little stand in the middle. And if ever I could afford it I'd have lace curtains hangin' from a pole' cross the front of the window. I think it would be perfectly lovely.'

No one but poor Miss Pickerell knew how dear the vision of unattained happiness was to her heart. She loved to talk about it, she dreamed about it; and sometimes, in the solitude of her chamber, away from the eyes of the world, she cried softly because she felt that this sweet ideal would never become a splendid reality.

She had a habit of talking to herself, and giving herself some severe “goings over,” as she called them. On such occasions as she assumed a very severe aspect and said sternly:

“Now you dry right up, 'Rindy Pick'rell. Don't you carry your ongratefulness a mite further. Here you are already enjoying blessins' without number and fretin' cause you can't have more. You've good lungs and a sound liver and don't know what it is to lang'ish on a sick bed. You've enough to eat and wear, and you've church and prayer-meeting privileges and here you might 'o been one of those dreadful heathens and not ever known what it was to be half descent. You're too ongrateful and rebell'yous to live, Rindy Pick'rell.'

And then her thin, cracked voice would penitently sing:

> “And air we wretches yit alive,
> And do we still rebel.
> 'Tis wondrous, 'tis amizin' grace
> That we are out of hell.”

Miss 'Rindy was a very conscientious woman, and could not help thinking that it was very sinful to set her heart on anything that was of the earth earthly. She made no allowance for the limitations of her poor human nature, but thought she ought to lead a life of impossible goodness, and made a virtue of denying herself many things quite innocent in themselves.

She was a spinster of 40 years. Her home was a snug little home of four incredibly tidy rooms on a little farm in a Western state. This home had been left her by her parents, and for ten years she had lived alone in it. The house stood within the limits of a small village and Miss 'Rindy added to her small income by plain sewing for the villagers.

There were but ten acres in her little farm, and five of these were pasture land for her cow. On the other five she had a small field of corn for her cow's feed in winter.

She lived very comfortably, as she said, but there was little left for unnecessary expenditure when all her bills were paid and something laid aside for her “rainy days” that Miss 'Rindy felt must come to her when she was too old and feeble to sew any longer,

“That bay window would cost me $69.78,” Miss 'Rindy often said “I've had it figgered out more than once, and I reckon I'll have to take it out in figgers,”.

Everybody knew and liked Miss 'Rindy, and sympathizing friends often said:

“It a pity the poor soul can't have that bay window she hankers after so. It's the only thing on earth she seems to want that she hasn't got. She'd take more comfort settin' in that bay window than Queen Victoria takes settin' on her throne,” conclusion quite correct, I have no doubt.

And others said:

“It's an awful pity 'Rindy Pick'rell never got married. Some man got cheated out of most an amazin' good wife by her stayin' an old maid.”

Not for all the world would poor Clarinda Pickerell have had a soul known it, but away down in the secret recessess of her tender heart there was hidden away an unspoken regret that she was Miss Pickerell still; an unspoken longing for sympathy and companionship and love in her loneliness.

And in this her fortieth year this heart secret began to find its way to her trembling life in some of those solemn conversations she had with herself.

Miss 'Rindy always felt particularly lonely during the holiday season. Her friends were often too entirely engrossed in their own joys and plans to think of her, and it nearly always happened that she spent Christmas alone.

“And of what earthly account is turkey and cranberry sass and mince pies where one has to set down to them by one's self,” she often said tersely to herself. “I ain't the heart to get up an extra dinner on Christmas, and half the time I'm so bad off I can't even find anybody to ask to come in and eat with me. Now if I only had that bay window it'd be a sight of compn'y for me Christmas and all other times. I'd set to it all the time I was to home.”

There was something very pathetic in the half jesting and half sincere tone in which Miss 'Rindy sometimes said:

“I'd like to know what old maids are born for anyhow. They're only fit for folks to poke fun at, and the best of folks will do it sometimes. Here I am, lone and lorne at Christmas and all holiday times, and not even a bay window to set in.”

More pathetic were the low-spoken words she said one day while looking at the reflection of herself in the little oval miror that hung over the old-fashioned bureau in her bedroom.

“You ain't so very homely 'Rindy Pick'rell,” she said, and her eyes were suspiciously moist as she said it. “You're awful dark complected, but your cheeks ain't sunk in any, and all your teeth are sound and good. You've hardly a gray hair, you don't have to wear spectacles, and you ain't as wrinkled as some are at your age. Older and uglier wimmen than you have got married and you might—”

“Miss 'Rindy sank back in her chair with both hands held over her crimson face. Sternly she rebuked herself:

“Shame on you, Rindy Pick'rell,” she said in pitiless self-condemnation. “Shame on you to think and say such things when nobody never asked you to have 'em yet. For shame, for shame!”

She was crying softly now with her gingham apron to her streaming eyes.

“Are you getting immodest, indecent in your old age, 'Rindy Pick'rell?” she asked harshly. “Do you forgit that the Pick'rells were all ladies? And shall you be the first to disgrace 'em by flingin' yourself at the men like this? You that ain't never even had a beau—at least not for years and years; not since that silly of a Hiram Murray beaued you home——”

Miss 'Rindy was crying in dead earnest now. The poor little romance of her life had seen so vividly recalled by the name she had spoken.

In the days of her early girlhood a certain Hiram Murray had “beaued her home from meetin'” on three distinct occasions. He had sent her a valtine of paper lace with a red and a green heart on it, a golden spear running through both, and a pair of turtle-doves perched in one corner, and inside he had committed himself by writing:

> “If you love me as I love you,
> No knife can cut our love in two.”

And inside the cover he had made this passionate and unequivocal declaration:

> “I know a girl and she is sweet,
> And Pick'rell is her name,
> I love her from her head to feet,
> I'd share with her my wealth and fame.”

Miss' Rindy had this treasure laid carefully away along with a huge candy heart, the love offering of the same Hiram, with the words “Be Mine” on it in gilt letters.

And now they were but tokens of the duplicity and utter deceit of mankind, for Hiram had for twenty years been the husband of another, and nine children called him “pap.”

“And he's poor as mud,” said Miss 'Rindy, suddenly drying her eyes and sitting erect, “and I'd ruther have that bay window than Hiram Murray with the nine children throwed in.”

It lacked but a month of Christmas Day and the people of the village were merry over their little secrets and surprises to come. Their happiness made Miss 'Rindy heavy at heart as she went from place to place plying her needle.

“What do you want Santa Claus to bring you?” asked one of Miss 'Rindy's friends.

“A bay window,” was the prompt and decisive reply. “I'd ruther have a bay window in the sittin'-room than a di'mond necklace with ev'ry di'mond as big as a hick'ry nut. But I don't expect either. 'If wishes were horses then beggars might ride,” she added with a tinge of bitterness for which she keenly reproached herself a moment later.

Three weeks before Christmas a strange thing happened at the little house belonging to Miss Pickerell. She was thinking about that bay window. More than that, she had a pencil and a bit of paper in her hand and had drawn a diagram of that very window, when the door opened suddenly and in came Mr John Hall, the village carpenter, a most worthy man, held in the highest esteem because of his honesty, industry, sobriety and the fact that he owned one of the neatest and best houses in the town, and was a thrifty and good citizen generally.

“How do you do, Miss Pickerell,” he said cheerily.

“I'm very well, thank you,” replied Miss 'Rindy, concealing her paper and pencil in some confusion.

“Glad to hear it,” said Mr. Hall heartily. No, thank you; I won't lay off my overcoat. I just run in on a little matter of business. It's about that bay window I hear you want to put in.”

Miss 'Rindy, in a greater confusion than ever, made haste to say:

“Oh, Mr. Hall; somebody must have made a mistake. I'm not going to put in a bay window. I would if I could; but I haven't the means to do it with and I don't think I ever shall have.”

“That's all right,” said Mr. Hall heartily, producing a tape line and rule. “But if you'll kindly allow me to I'll just take the measure for that window all the same,” and before Miss 'Rindy could recover from her bewildering surprise, he added in a more sober tone:

“Miss 'Rindy, when my poor wife lay sick so long two years ago you was one of the best and kindest friends she had. She often said so herself. She said you did more to make her last days happy and peaceful than any one else but me in the world. She remembered and blest you in her last hours, and I shall always remember what you did for us then and for my little boy and girl whose true freind you have been to this day.

“I've often wanted to do something to show you I was grateful, and I've intended to all along. But you know I've been away a great deal of late and it was only the other day I heard about that little bay window plan of yours that's worried you so long. Wish I'd known of it before. Seems to me I've heard you speak of it, but it kind of escaped my mind.

“And now I've come to put that window in. It's wonderful fine weather for it, and it can all be put in in a day by having most of the work done at the shop. Now don't you say a word, Miss Pickerell. I'm going to put that window in whither or no, and you can call it a Christmas gift if you want to.”

“Why, Mr. Hall—John!”

She had known him all her life, but it was only because of her excitement that she called him “John.”

“He instantly rejoined, “It's all right, 'Rindy; all right. You can say John if you're a mind to, and I——”

But Miss 'Rindy had disappeared. Abashed, but happy to her heart's depths, she had fled from the room and into her own chamber where the simple soul fell on her knees and thanked the Lord again and again for that bay window.

I am always unfortunate in my love stories. I will “let the cat out of the bag,” as Miss 'Rindy would say, before I want to. And this is to end as a love story. Any one with half an eye can see that. It has been glaringly evident ever since she called him “John” and he called her “'Rindy.” I hoped to bring this out as a sort of delightful little surprise to all my readers, and I hope still that you are all surprised—surprised and glad.

It took John Hall a remarkably long time to put that bay window in, considerering the fact that he said the work could all be done in a day. He was ten whole days at it—or something else.

It was not until the window was completed and the plants and pictures, and canary birds were in it that the actual proposal came.

Miss 'Rindy sat in the bay window at the time, an advantage John Hall considered well and availed himself of. He knew she would be to happy to say him nay if she sat in the bay window when he proposed.

She said yes, simply, tearfully and without insulting her womanly modesty, I may add gratefully. He need never know it.

They kept their secret better then I have kept it. Not a soul of all the villagers had the faintest suspicion of its real import when Miss 'Rindy went from house to house inviting her nearest friends to come to her house on the evening of Christmas day,

And they all came. The little house was full. The pretty bay window, flower-bedecked and lace-curtained, was admired to Miss 'Rindy's heart's content.

At half-past 8 she suddenly disappeared into her own room and closed the door behind her.

At nine she stepped shyly forth, transformed into what one of the old ladies present called “the most comfortable looking bride.”

Her old black cashmere worn in the early part of the evening, had been exchange for the neatest and most becoming grey silk, with bands of real lace at the neck and sleeves. There were pink and white rosebuds at her throat and in her hair, and a very pink rose on either cheek as John Hall stepped forth and took her hand to lead her to the bay window.

And there they were married, “before any of us could get our senses,” said one of the guests.

“It was the biggest kind of a surprise and 'Rindy looked about as much surprised as anybody.”

Indeed she said herself long afterward that she “couldn't hardly realize it yet.”

“To think,” she said simply, “of having that blessed bay window after all and such a dear, good man as John Hall throwed in with it. Indeed I might say four bay windows, for there's that many in John's house and we're going to move in there in the spring. I just couldn't move out of my own little house until I'd set awhile in my own bay window and seen all the things I always said I'd see from it. What a blessed Christmas it was for me when I got John and the window for my gifts.”

Already Provided.

From a Washington Letter.

One thing that Mrs. Harrison will find is a completely furnished house—solid silver, the finest of china, linen for the table, and bed-chambers, elegant furnishings in the parlors and fairly good in the private parts of the house. The private dining-room is on the first floor, just across the hall from the state dining-room. This is the only room on the first floor used by the family of the President. The parlors are used for callers, and the entire family or “living” rooms are on the second floor. There are, perhaps, half a dozen of these, scarcely more; a sitting-room or two next to the circular “library-room,” where the President sits during his business and working hours, and several handsomely furnished bed-rooms and dressing-rooms. An elevator carries the family down-stairs at meal-time, and when they go down for other purposes if they desire it, but as a rule they walk up and down the broad, easy and luxuriantly carpeted stairs and through the handsome and always attractive corridors which lead the way to the dining-rooms and parlors on the first floor. There they find everything ready, for the experienced steward is able to relieve the mistress of the White House of all cares of housekeeping—if he is well paid for it.

Tattooing Convicts.

A Buffalo (N. Y.) prison official is quoted as saying that the latest fad in prison management is tattooing. “It is a ready means of identification,” he adds, “and is bound to become popular in prison management. My idea is to tattoo a convict every time he is imprisoned, and then we'll have his record as clear as the moon at midnight. Let each penal institution adopt a different mark or monogram and the problem of identifying convicts will be solved. It is the simplest and best system yet proposed. To some persons it may seem as harsh as branding, but it isn't. Tattooing isn't painful, and the marks could be put on the convict's back, arms or legs, and would not embarrass reformed convicts.

The Legend of the Black Mountain.

In the south of the city of Cork, and forming the boundary of the Catholic parishes of Ballygarvan and Ballymartle lies Duibhe Shliabh (Anglice, the Black mountain) which is said to be, since the annihilation of the Fiann Eirionn at Gabhra (now Garristown, county Dublin,) by the Ard Righ Cairbre Mac Art; the residence of the celebrated Dannonian Princess Deirdre, who was up to that period the trusted female messenger of Fionn Mac-Cumhall. After his death she fled far from the scene of his fall to this mountain, where she must stay (according to popular belief, until Erin regains once more the prestige which she once held among the nations of the earth. Or as the Bard would say—

> “Through all error and confusion
> Till she set the clear conclusion
> Standing like a queen alone,
> All things adverse overthrown.”

There is scarcely a fireside from South Gate Bridge to Clonakilty, that has not witnessed eager groups listening some time or other to the many generous acts which Deirdre has bestowed on her midnight votaries, since the year 284 A. D., when she first took up her abode in the mountain up to the present. A few of the tales told on such occasions may not be uninteresting to the generality of my readers.

On a certain July night in the year 1426, John De Barra accompanied by his only son Patrick left Kinsale with some swine, which they intended to sell at Cork on the morrow. The market was then at Fatha na Croithe, and not at Goll an Spurra, where it lies at present,

However, when they came as far as Drochad ui Naoi, the father bade the son to return home, as he could himself drive the swine for the remainder of the journey. According they parted as the morning was beginning to dawn on the rim of the distant horizon. The young man, instead of going back the road he had come, took a shorter route across the Black Mountain. Scarcely had he reached the summit, ere he saw approaching him a maid of the lovliest aspect, on whose head was placed a crown of the rarest emeralds. Entranced he stood gazing on the lovely form, when she presently exclaimed in a mild angelic voice:

“Young man, thy name is Patrick De Barra—thou hast come from Kinsale with thy father, who has journeyed on to Cork, with seventeen fat swine. I say, immediately follow after him, for he will sadly need thee. Take this staff in thy hand, and keep it as a memento of me. While thou hast it thou wilt be the most powerful man throughout lovely Erin. But do not further delay, thy father needeth thee. Farewell! I am Deirdre of the Black Mountain.”

Immediately that she spoke the concluding words, she disappeared as if by magic; and sorely bewildered, Patrick De Barra retraced his foot steps and followed his father to Cork. When he reached the market at Fatha na Croithe, he found his father well-nigh dead from the effect of a beating given him by a few drunken individuals, with whom he had quarreled, relative to the price of swine. Seeing his father in such a plight, he charged with the staff of Deirdre, all in the market, and succeeded in utterly routing and dispersing them—the innocent as well as the guilty.

After some difficulty he succeeded in gathering together his father's swine and sold them at a good reasonable price, to a friend of his, who lived at Barrack street. Then after procuring a drink of nut brown ale for his worthy parent, that individual recovered from the effects of his drubbing, and soon after both took their departure for Kinsale. In the journey home, the young man related to his astonished and delighted parent the boon conferred on him by the mysterious woman, whom he had met that morning on the summit of the Black Mountain.

From thence forward he was the strongest man found in Erin; and tradition informs us, that he succeeded on more occasions than one, in administering chastisement on the haughty Norman De Courceys of Kinsale, who vainly endeavored during his lifetime to gain by foul means, possession of his vast estates.

Such is one specimen of Deirdre's generosity. The following also exhibits her good nature, but in a different manner.

On a cold December night in the 1699, Patrick MacGearalt was taking a short cut towards home through the Black Mountains; but he accidentally lost his way in the darkness of night. He kept wandering about for a few hours vainly endeavoring to regain the path from which he had parted, but his efforts were of no avail, until eventually he beheld a magnificent castle a short distance from him—the walls of which reflected the different hues of the rainbow. He advanced boldly up to it, where it was met by a watchman of a very diminutive size; being scarcely two feet in height; who wore a red breeches, yellow waistcoat, green jacket, and a cap in which were blended the three colors, with remarkable distinctness. They both kindly saluted each other, after which the little gentleman ushered Patrick into the presence of the owner of the castle—a young woman of rare beauty. She bade him be seated and rest till morning, as the night was cold and bitter without.

With her request he instantly complied, being more than glad to do so, as he was nearly benumbed with cold and fatigue. Supper was then laid before him and his little friend whose acquaintance he had made at the gate; and when he had eaten his sufficient, he was supplied—this time by the hostess—with a measure of pure sparkling wine, which made him somewhat hilarious.

Being naturally of a poetic temperament, he launched forth into a flood of melody, in praise of the generosity of his fair hostess, and also of her various charms, and asked was she Deirdre of Ulster, that caused such commotion on account of her matchless beauty.

In the same noble strain did she reply, that she was not Deirdre of Ulster, but Deirdre, of the Black Mountain, who at a remote period had been the trusted messenger of the brave and powerful Fionn Mac Cumhall who had lost his life through treachery, at the sanguinary battle of Gabbra. “After his death,” said she, “I came to live in this mountain, where I an to stay until > “Erin shall be free, from the center to the sea,

> In the years that yet shall be.”

“That is until the legislators of our country shall sit—after their liberties have been taken from them by fraud, and ultimately won back by them under a brave and trusted leader—to make laws for the government of their dear country. When that glad time comes, then I must speed away to Garvach—a mountain by the Lee where I must stay forever after.”

After this, the little gateman, who had been an attentive listner to all that was spoken between Patrick and his fair hostess, showed the former where he should pass the night. Accordingly he retired to rest, and fell into a sound and peaceful slumber; but when he awoke on the morrow he found himself not in a bed of down in a beautiful castle, but stretched on the heather, on the summit of the Black Mountain.

A Queen's Household.

Queen Victoria's household, says Good Housekeeping, has nearly a thousand officers, subordinates and attendants. The Lord Steward is at the head of all with a salary of $10,000 a year. All officers and servants, except those connected with the Queen's, chamber, stable and chapel, are subject to his orders. The active duties of this officer are performed by the Master of the Household, who gets $5,790 a year. The Lord Treasurer ranks next to the Lord Steward and acts for him in case he is absent, while to assist him he has the Comptroller of the Householder, who likewise does nothing. The Board of Green Cloth, composed of the four above named officials, adjudicates on offences committed in certain parts of the palace, and has clerks and secretary. The clerk of the kitchen and his clerks keep accounts, check goods and give orders to tradespeople.

There is a chief and many cooks a heard of the confectionary department, of the “ewer” or linen department, a chief butler, table deckers, men in charge of the plate, pantry and of the coal, and lamp lighters and dispensers of alms. The Lord Steward is judge of the Court of Marshalsea, with power to dispense justice among the Queen's domestic servants, and the court has a Knight Marshal. The Lord Chamberlain gets $10,000 a year and, with the Vice Chamberlain, superintend all the officers and servants of the Queen's chambers, except the bed chambers, these being under the Groom of the State, as well as the officers of the wardrobe. The keeper of Her Majesty's Privy Purse is her financial secretary at a salary of $10,000. There are the Mistress of the Robes; Ladies of the Bed Chambers, Maids of Honor, bed chamber women, Lords in Waiting, Grooms in Waiting; Gentlemen Ushers of the Privy Chamber, Daily Waiters, Quarterly Waiters, Grooms of the Privy Chambers, Grooms the Great Chamber and Gentleman of the Privy Chamber. The Marshal of Ceremonies must have an absolute knowledge of Court etiquette.

The official places many of them call for no performance of duty, because with the change of customs the duties have become obsolete. The Master of the Tennis Court does nothing. There are a Master of the House, burgomaster, keeper of the swans, and hundreds of assistants to the officers mentioned. All this looks like keeping house under difficulties, and Queen Victoria ought to be well paid for it.

Wedded an Heiress, Drives a Mule.

St. Louis Globe Democrat.

A few weeks ago the Chicago papers contained accounts of the elopement of Miss Roach, the nineteen-year old daughter of a millionaire capitalist of that city, with a young clerk named Cunningham. The young lady, it seems, was a social belle, and the marraige created the usual nine days' gossip in a large circle of friends and acquaintances. After marriage the young couple came to Kansas City and for a few days boarded at a leading hotel. Their money running out and no remittances coming from the wealthy but irate father, Cunningham was forced to seek work. All the work he could find to do was as a street-car driver, and he is now swinging the whip over a pair of metropolitan mules, and his little wife is keeping house in a humble little home on Charlotte street. When she becomes of age in two years she will have a fortune in her own right. It seems that the irate father is beginning to relent, for the other day he sent the young woman a check for $50, with a promise of more on Christmas.

Her Lock of Hair.

From Brownsburg, Ind., comes the story that a young lady sent a note to a discarded lover requesting the return of a lock of hair which, during his courtship, he had clipped from her dainty tresses. His reply was brief and to the point. Rummaging his trunk he collected a a number of tresses culled from various “best girls” during his love making career, and forwarded them in a bundle to the girl, inclosing a note to the effect that he had really forgotten which was hers, but she might select it from those forwarded and return the rest at her convenience. They don't speak now as they pass by.

On Friday evening the Salmagundi Club entertained a number of invited guests, at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Wheeler. The following program was listened to by an appreciative audience: Three Fishers, song and tableau, Mr. Wheeler, Mr. and Mrs. McKee, Mr. Kelso, Miss Minnie Ayers, Mr. Hart and Miss Maggie Brown. Arrangements for this number had been carefully made and it was, perhaps, the most perfect of the evening. Next was a piano duett by Mrs. Wheeler and Miss Ayers, which was well received. The tableau, "An Artist at Work in his Studio," called forth admiring remarks from the audience. Miss Nettie Brown and Mr. Crawford were the characters. Miss Minnie Ayers sang in her usual brilliant style, accompanied by piano and flute. Then came the fun-inspiring number of the program, a shadow pantomine—"Mary Jane." Miss Ayers made a great success as "Mary Jane," while Mr. Hart, as "Lord Mortimer." threw the audience into convulsions of merriment with his majestic attitudes. Mell Milne took the part of "Benjamin" and was frightened by a cow of alarming proportions. Miss Clara Aaker sang a selected solo, and charmed her hearers as she always does. The closing number was a tableau—"Love in Leap Year," by Miss Aaker and Mr. Crawford, who did so well that the desired effect of a closing scene was realized and the company found itself in admirable spirits for a good social time. The ladies of the club soon betook themselves to the culinary regions, from whence soon emerged such an amount of good things to the taste, by way of pop-corn-balls and candy, (the fruits of faithful work by the aforementioned ladies, earlier in the day) as to occupy the attention of all present for some time. After a very pleasant hour of informal talk and merry-making the company departed, each face wearing an expression, gratifying to the members of the club. Below we give a list of the guests; Mr. and Mrs. Erskine, Mr. and Mrs. Ayers, Mr. and Mrs. Vance, Prof. and Mrs. Moore, Mr. and Mrs. Sawyer, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Mix, Mr. and Mrs. Cahoon, Mr. and Mrs. Hitchcock, Mr. and Mrs. Milne, Mrs. A. Brown, Mrs. Elmer, Miss Moore and Miss Brown.

The Young People's Alliance of the M. E. church held a scripture and song service, New Year's eve, which was well attended. At its close a social was held, followed during the last hour of the old year by a watch service. Rev. Nicholson, of Ada, was present and gave a brief but very interesting address.

The Monarch Shirt is the best in the market. Found only at the Boston One Price Store.

Alfred D. White, one of the typographical fraternity, arrived in the city on Monday. He had been in Minneapolis trying to secure work, but without success, so he struck for this section where he found work without difficulty. The northwest is not so slow in any respect as many older portions of the country.

Francis is the only photographer in the northwest doing first-class cabinet photographs for $2.50 per dozen.

Rev. Chas. Carroll, gathered a group of his neighbors about him on New Year's day, all attired in summer wraps, fans, parasols, etc., while one of the artists of the city took a "winter scene in northern Minnesota." It is rumored that the gentlemen of the party were obliged to remove their dusters to obscure certain patches of snow, but as it was one who was not in the group, (but wished he had been) who suggested it, we are tempted to say it was a case of "sour grapes."

The "noble red man," confined in the county jail on charge of store-breaking at Thief River Falls, is making the most of his advantages in learning, from a fellow prisoner, the art of writing, etc. He already takes pride in the accomplishment of writing his name in legible characters, and we imagine his many friends on the Reserve will be green with envy when, released from his present quarters, he exhibits his skill in the chiographic art. Our advice to him would be to throw over the tomahawk and devote his future time to professional card-writing among his tribe.

Hosiery in endless variety at C. O. D. Clothing House.

Two men, transacting business in this city, were settling an account. No. 2 gave No. 1 a dollar bill in change. No. 1, with a grimace, said: "What did you give me that for? I promised to give my wife every dollar bill I received!" Later, No. 2 in looking over the account, finding he had received a dollar exceeding his just dues, proceeded to the bank, exchanged a silver dollar for paper, sought No. 1 and remarked: "You gave me a dollar too much on that deal, I'll pay you now!" and going into the depths of his pocket, drew forth the paper. No. 1 hasn't decided yet whether to challenge No. 2 to meet him in deadly combat, keep the matter hushed up, or tell the joke on himself.

On the night of the 31st, before the coming in of the New Year, a meteor crossed the southern sky, so brilliant as to light for an instant, the whole landscape. Was there something suggestive in this, at the time of the going out of an old year?

Fleet footman of a dying year,
  Against night's darkened sky,
Appearing—instantly to disappear.
  Before man's startled eye:
Why do we watch with bated breath
  Thy flight o'er heaven's steep;
Then let Time's silent wheels of death
  Glide by, nor break our sleep?
For not more swift thy passing by,
  Than race the steeds of time—
A sudden start, a dazzled eye—
  Then final midnight's chime.

Mr. L. E. Burgener, of Oberlin, Ohio, arrived on Saturday for a visit of several weeks with his cousin Mrs. S. M. McKee.

Will Perry, the prisoner who attempted his own life on Christmas Day, was taken to the asylum the latter part of the week.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Stanton entertained the Rev. Mr. Carroll and wife, the deacons of the Baptist church and their wives, on Saturday evening.

Andrew Eiken won the elegant smokers sett offered by the Catholic Fair. It is a daisy and Andrew is pondering whether to present it as a New Year's gift to THE JOURNAL man or learn to smoke. Our advice would be: "Young man, don't—smoke!"

It is not every country that has an eclipse as a New Year's present. Such was the case however in Minnesota—famed for her lovely winter weather. Everybody enjoyed the fine show which commenced a little after 3 p. m., lasting nearly an hour.

E. F. Elliot has been in St. Paul in attendance upon the School Superintendents' meeting. It was a very interesting session and much good will be the outcome doubtless. The Supes will recommend much needed legislation at the coming session.

Frank Benoit, who last summer received an appointment as mail clerk on the N. P. R. R. between St. Paul and Mandan, had his wages raised from $800 to $1,000 a year on Jan. 1st. That's as high as he can get. His early promotion speaks well for his proficiency.

Grunde Tollefson, a prosperous granger of Sletten, was in this week visiting friends, and, of course, dropped in to have a pleasant chat with THE JOURNAL. Mr. T. reports farmers happy in the enjoyment of this fine weather and the sure prospects of good prices next year.

Harry Ives went to St. Paul on Saturday evening to look after his clerkship. Harry has the good wishes and support of many friends here, has Senator Sampson's approval and backing and has strong influential friends in the Senate. We consider his chances the best of any candidate in the field.

The handsome junior partner of the firm of Christianson Bros., went to Ada last week where, on Sunday Dec. 30th, he was united for life to Miss Helland, of that city the Rev. Mr. Larson performing the interesting ceremony. THE JOURNAL unites with their hosts of friends in congratulations and extends a hearty welcome to our city, to the fair young bride.

How do the few papers in the Fifth District that still support Washburn like he action of the Washburn managers in trying to down our candidate for speaker, Col. Graves? Is this a part of their promised reward? Must this great Northwest forever dance to the music of the two great cities, and do their bidding in everything? Have we no rights that the twins are bound to respect? What they ask us to do is to elect Washburn to the U. S. Senate and Morgan speaker of the house. We would like to know where the persimmons for the Fifth District are in that deal?

The ball given by the band New Years eve., is reported as a grand success.

M. D. Allard and family came down from Auburn, D. T., last week having been burned out in the recent big fire at that place. Mr. A. formerly resided in this city going from here to Argyle. His many friends here will sympathize with him in his severe loss.

On Friday, the little daughter of Express Agent Dyer, after a brief illness, passed the border land, leaving her parents to mourn that their treasure should so soon be taken from them. The sincere sympathy of their many friends is with them in their deep affliction.

At 4 o'clock on New Years morning, Mr. Charles Wright, who for some days had been confined to his bed by consumption, passed into rest surrounded by his family, who mourn the loss of a loving husband and father. The funeral took place today at the residence of the deceased, at 11 o'clock.

Warren Register: Bro. Cooke of THE POLK COUNTY JOURNAL was in Warren on Friday and gave us a friendly grip. He went over the senatorial question pro and con, and left us impressed with the idea that he was rather in favor of Sabin getting there, unless a Duluth man or some one up this way can be elected, which is hardly probable.

On New Years day, while assisting a lady from his carriage, at the Sherman house, Pat Conners' team took fright from a passing locomotive and started to run, crossing diagonally across the street, they dashed between Herb's and the city scales, and then up Main street at a terrible rate of speed, meeting a buggy, in which a lady was riding, on the hill, they struck the vehicle with such force that the lady was thrown to the ground, but escaped injury. Passing over the hill, they took a circuitous route to the northeast, returned to town, and ran into Alderman & Sylvester's livery stable on Ash street breaking the buggy pole, and two spokes from one wheel.

New Years Doings.

Never in the history of the city were New Years customs observed as on Tuesday. All during the afternoon, the streets in the residence portion of the city were lively with the whirl of wheels and the interchange of New Years salutations among the gentlemen as they went about calling at the respective homes of the ladies who kept open houses. We give below, a list of ladies who received, together with those who assisted them:

Mrs. J. A. Bemis.

Mrs. C. F. Mix, assisted by Mesdames Stevens and Stearns.

Mrs. Anglim assisted by Mesdames Dampier, Thorsen, Gravel, Misses Maggie Brown and Lottie Anglim.

Mrs. Ayers, assisted by Mesdames Erskine, Vance, Wheeler, McKee, Misses Erskine, Aaker, Moore, Mamie and Minnie Ayers.

Mrs. Sawyer, assisted by Mesdames Jennings, Copeland, Misses Campbell, Edith Copeland, Minim Fontaine.

Mrs. Fortier, assisted by Mesdames J. W. Harmon, J. Wood.

Mrs. A. A. Miller, assisted by Mesdames Fuller and Dawley.

Mrs. Wile, assisted by Mesdames Durand, Rosenthal, Alexander, Misses Mix.

The following gentlemen went out together; Rev. Carroll, Medlar and Fortin.

Messrs. Wile, Winnie, Alexander, Rosenthal, Adams.

Messrs. Graves, Grey and Walker.

Messrs. Anglim, Gravel, Dampier, Thorsen and Hertz.

Altogether it was an enjoyable day to all who participated in its enjoyments.

M. R. BROWN.

BABEL, Polk Co., Minn., Dec. 31.

ED. JOURNAL: Christmas has come and gone, with the finest kind of weather for this season of the year, and it looks as if it will continue until we pass over to the unknown 1889. I thought of sending you a New Year's present, but remembering that I owed you for the next year's subscription on the paper, I concluded to send you it. which, no doubt, will be as much appreciated as a—doll, or something of that kind.

I would like to say a few words about the strife for U. S. Senator. I believe that we want a man that is not only willing to free us from that heavy burden, Grover Cleveland, but is also willing to take off some of that still heavier burden—taxation. In other words we want a man that honestly will work for a tariff tax reduction. We have such men in Knute Nelson, Gordon E. Cole, and others. I hope that our senators and representatives in the legislature can easily see that we, as farmers especially, can't spare Mr. Washburn, as we want him at Minneapolis to fix the grade on our wheat, or we will have no grade at all by-and-by.

You may wonder where Babel is in Polk County. Well, I shall not tell you this time, but according to our local newspaper of late, "Babel" will answer better for the place than any other name I can think of just now,

Wishing you a Happy New Year, I remain, yours, truly,

A FARMER.

Correspondence Fertile Journal.

As I have just came back from Crookston. where the seat of justice for this our county, is located, I would like to tell many of your readers that were not there how things seemed to be run.

First: The Court was filled to overflowing with evil-doers and justice-seekers. They were busy and bustling about back and forth in the court room, and attorneys, judge and jurors were doing all they could to wind up business. All seemed to be satisfactorily settled, but pistol-shooters and saloon-frequenters seemed to have the poorest show to have the judge's and jury's sympathy, and that shows that our district has a sound thinking populace, and above all a No 1 good judge, with a clear and brilliant understanding of all cases and matters that came before him. Judge Mills is a good one.

Crookston is of course profiting by this court, and all the hotels seems to be filled with people; but of them all none were as full as the Sherman house, which was crowded to the uttermost of its capacity.

The populace from the so-called Thirteen Towns is now in a kind of booming fever and is also helping to keep Crookston up. Crookston is like an olden city and a Queen between the many Waters and the seventy or more townships, constituting the empire of our great Polk County.

May peace and prosperity from the Almighty rest upon this community and the whole land.

P. H. STROMME.

KING CARNIVAL.

King Carnival will hold his annual festival in the fourth year of his reign at his Ice Palace of the north land, at St. Paul, Minnesota, beginning January 23d and ending February 1st, 1889.

The St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway, for the accommodation of their patrons, will sell tickets at very low rates from all points on their lines to St. Paul on and between the dates given above.

Preparations are being made on a scale commensurate with the importance of this great event, for an entertainment on a scale heretofore unequalled by previous carnivals.

There will be grand processions of the various Toboggan clubs loyal subjects to his royal highness, King Carnival, during the carnival.

The magnificent Ice Palace, to be eaected near the banks of the Father of the Waters, the Mississippi, will be constructed on a more elaborate plan and on a scale of grandeur never before attempted. All Carnival clubs in the Northwest will attend the grand storming of the Ice Palace which takes place during the Carnival. There will be Ski races hotly contested by the various Scandinavian Ski Clubs, while the Sons of Old Scotia will meet in friendly rivalry on the Curling Grounds.

For further information apply to your St. P., M. & M. Ticket Agent, or F. I. Whitney, General Passenger and Ticket Agent, St. Paul, Minn.

The Cap Sheaf.

The great dailies of St. Paul and Minneapolis all tried their hands at a holiday edition on Christmas day and got out very creditable sheets, but, on New Years day comes the Minneapolis Tribune with the cap sheaf in form of a regular 16 page magazine with beautiful covers. It is the handsomest and best gotten up holiday edition that has come to our table during this holiday season.

About Fast Walking.

Orange Judd Farmer.

Walking is healthful for man or woman. It exercises nearly all the muscles of the body, and produces a free circulation of the blood, and good digestion—all so necessary to a sound condition. If American women of all classes would walk only as much as English ladies do, it would promote the health and vigor of the present generation of women, and the next generation of both sexes would be far stronger and more healthful. If we were back to boyhood, with our present knowledge and observation, we would cultivate our locomotive energies with a great deal of care. By practice, begun early in life most persons can acquire the ability to walk four or five miles an hour with ease, and "do" 40 to 60 miles a day without exhaustion or great fatigue. Unfortunately for the writer, he became prejudiced against walking by spending so much of his boyhood and youth in harrowing. The man held the plows; the boys followed the harrow in its endless, slow, monotonous, lonesome rounds, very irksome to an active mind, ambitious for something to exercise skill and brains upon. The walking muscles were exercised, but the slow gait in driving the team in "dragging," as harrowing was then called became a fixed habit by the time manhood was reached. We mention this for the benefit of the present boys, and their fathers too. For most farm work a horse whose natural gait is 3½ to 4 miles an hour is worth double one which has to be constantly urged and goaded to make 3 miles. A team before a wagon going to church or to mill, or to market, or before a load of grain, and particularly before the plow and harrow, which goes 3½ to 4 miles an hour, will accomplish a great deal more in a day or week then the slow gaited one, and will do it with less exhaustion, if care be taken to give frequent short "breathing spells," after driving rapidly on a walk, or trot or gallop. Give a brief "breathing spell" every mile or so, to relax the strained muscles but for a moment and the horse will be less exhausted at the end of a journey than the other team, which is kept on a steady unbroken jog or pull at only half the speed.

A MAN WALKING 105½ MILES DAILY.

While the "walking matches," so much in vogue, are a nuisance, and more or less demoralizing, they indirectly do some good by demonstrating what can be done by cultivating and exercising the muscles. In the match in New York, two weeks since, the men who started in at 12 o'clock Monday morning, and continued until 10 p. m. Saturday, there were no less than ten who made a distance of over 528 miles. Two of them walked in this time over 600 miles. The champion in the match, Littlewood, traveled 623½ in five days and 22 hours or an average of 105½ miles for each 24 hours. This feat has never been equaled, so far as is known. Much more speed has been attained for short spurts, and for distances of 50 to 100 miles, but in this case the man walked an average of 105½ miles for each of six successive days. Most will remember how much excitement there was when, but a very short time ago, it was announced that a man had walked 500 miles in the course of a week. But here we have half a score of men, not only exceeding this distance, but two of them adding more than 100 miles to it.

Miss Pickerell's Window

"If I can ever afford to do it I'm going to have a nice big bay window just in there where them two nasty little windows are."

Miss Clarinda Pickerell's friends had heard her make this remark over and over again. Often she added:

"I do think a bay window is one of the nicest things in the world They're so nice to set in. You can see so much from 'em. And how nice they are for plants. I've planned it all out time and ag'in jest how I'd fit my bay window up if ever the Lord let me have one.

"I'd have my geraniums and callas and heliotrope and oxalis and beg onia and fuschias and my wand'rin' Jew and ivy all in that window. Then I'd have my bird-cage hanging from the center, and mebby some day I could get me a gold fish in one of them glass pots to set on a little stand in the middle. And if ever I could afford it I'd have lace curtains hangin' from a pole' cross the front of the window. I think it would be perfectly lovely.'

No one but poor Miss Pickerell knew how dear the vision of unattained happiness was to her heart. She loved to talk about it, she dreamed about it; and sometimes, in the solitude of her chamber, away from the eyes of the world, she cried softly because she felt that this sweet ideal would never become a splendid reality.

She had a habit of talking to herself, and giving herself some severe "goings over," as she called them. On such occasions as she assumed a very severe aspect and said sternly: "Now you dry right up, Rindy Pick'rell. Don't you carry your ongratefulness a mite further. Here you are already enjoying blessins' without number and fretin' cause you can't have more. You've good lungs and a sound liver and don't know what it is to lang'ish on a sick bed. You've enough to eat and wear, and you've church and prayer-meeting privileges and here you might 'o been one of those dreadful heathens and not ever known what it was to be half descent. You're too ongrateful and rebell'yous to live, Rindy Pick'rell.'

And then her thin, cracked voice would penitently sing:

"And air we wretches yit alive,
And do westill rebel.
'Tis wondrous, 'tis amizin' grace
That we are out of hell."

Miss 'Rindy was a very conscientious woman, and could not help thinking that it was very sinful to set her heart on anything that was of the earth earthly. She made no allowance for the limitations of her poor human nature, but thought she ought to lead a life of impossible goodness, and made a virtue of denying herself many things quite innocent in themselves.

She was a spinster of 40 years. Her home was a snug little home of four incredibly tidy rooms on a little farm in a Western state. This home had been left her by her parents, and for ten years she had lived alone in it. The house stood within the limits of a small village and Miss 'Rindy added to her small income by plain sewing for the villagers.

There were but ten acres in her little farm, and five of these were pasture land for her cow. On the other five she had a small field of corn for her cow's feed in winter.

She lived very comfortably, as she said, but there was little left for unnecessary expenditure when all her bills were paid and something laid aside for her "rainy days" that Miss 'Rindy felt must come to her when she was too old and feeble to sew any longer,

"That bay window would cost me $69.78," Miss 'Rindy often said "I've had it figgered out more than once, and I reckon I'll have to take it out in figgers,".

Everybody knew and liked Miss 'Rindy, and sympathizing friends often said:

"It a pity the poor soul can't have that bay window she hankers after so. It's the only thing on earth she seems to want that she hasn't got. She'd take more comfort settin' in that bay window than Queen Victoria takes settin' on her throne," conclusion quite correct, I have no doubt.

And others said:

"It's an awful pity 'Rindy Pick'rell never got married. Some man got cheated out of most an amazin' good wife by her stayin' an old maid."

Not for all the world would poor Clarinda Pickerell have had a soul known it, but away down in the secret recessess of her tender heart there was hidden away an unspoken regret that she was Miss Pickerell still; an unspoken longing for sympathy and companionship and love in her loneliness.

And in this her fortieth year this heart secret began to find its way to her trembling life in some of those solemn conversations she had with herself.

Miss 'Rindy always felt particularly lonely during the holiday season. Her friends were often too entirely engrossed in their own joys and plans to think of her, and it nearly always happened that she spent Christmas alone.

"And of what earthly account is turkey and cranberry sass and mince pies where one has to set down to them by one's self," she often said tersely to herself. "I ain't the heart to get up an extra dinner on Christmas, and half the time I'm so bad off I can't even find anybody to ask to come in and eat with me. Now if I only had that bay window it'd be a sight of comp'ny for me Christmas and all other times. I'd set to it all the time I was to home."

There was something very pathetic in the half jesting and half sincere tone in which Miss 'Rindy sometimes said:

"I'd like to know what old maids are born for anyhow. They're only fit for folks to poke fun at, and the best of folks will do it sometimes. Here I am, lone and lorne at Christmas and all holiday times, and not even a bay window to set in."

More pathetic were the low-spoken words she said one day while looking at the reflection of herself in the little oval miror that hung over the old-fashioned bureau in her bedroom.

"You ain't so very homely 'Rindy Pick'rell," she said, and her eyes were suspiciously moist as she said it. "You're awful dark complected, but your cheeks ain't sunk in any, and all your teeth are sound and good. You've hardly a gray hair, you don't have to wear spectacles, and you ain't as wrinkled as some are at your age. Older and uglier wimmen than you have got married and you might—"

"Miss 'Rindy sank back in her chair with both hands held over her crimson face. Sternly she rebuked herself:

"Shame on you, Rindy Pick'rell," she said in pitiless self-condemnation. "Shame on you to think and say such things when nobody never asked you to have 'em yet. For shame, for shame!"

She was crying softly now with her gingham apron to her streaming eyes.

"Are you getting immodest, indecent in your old age, 'Rindy Pick'rell?" she asked harshly. "Do you forgit that the Pick'rells were all ladies? And shall you be the first to disgrace 'em by flingin' yourself at the men like this? You that ain't never even had a beau—at least not for years and years; not since that silly of a Hiram Murray beaued you home——"

Miss 'Rindy was crying in dead earnest now. The poor little romance of her life had seen so vividly recalled by the name she had spoken.

In the days of her early girlhood a certain Hiram Murray had "beaued her home from meetin'" on three distinct occasions. He had sent her a valtine of paper lace with a red and a green heart on it, a golden spear running through both, and a pair of turtle-doves perched in one corner, and inside he had committed himself by writing:

"If you love me as I love you,
No knife can cut our love in two."

And inside the cover he had made this passionate and unequivocal declaration:

"I know a girl and she is sweet,
And Pick'rell is her name,
I love her from her head to feet,
I'd share with her my wealth and fame."

Miss' Rindy had this treasure laid carefully away along with a huge candy heart, the love offering of the same Hiram, with the words "Be Mine" on it in gilt letters.

And now they were but tokens of the duplicity and utter deceit of mankind, for Hiram had for twenty years been the husband of another, and nine children called him "pap."

"And he's poor as mud," said Miss 'Rindy, suddenly drying her eyes and sitting erect, "and I'd ruther have that bay window than Hiram Murray with the nine children throwed in."

It lacked but a month of Christmas Day and the people of the village were merry over their little secrets and surprises to come. Their happiness made Miss 'Rindy heavy at heart as she went from place to place plying her needle.

"What do you want Santa Claus to bring you?" asked one of Miss 'Rindy's friends.

"A bay window," was the prompt and decisive reply. "I'd ruther have a bay window in the sittin'-room than a di'mond necklace with ev'ry di'mond as big as a hick'ry nut. But I don't expect either. 'If wishes were horses then beggars might ride," she added with a tinge of bitterness for which she keenly reproached herself a moment later.

Three weeks before Christmas a strange thing happened at the little house belonging to Miss Pickerell. She was thinking about that bay window. More than that, she had a pencil and a bit of paper in her hand and had drawn a diagram of that very window, when the door opened suddenly and in came Mr John Hall, the village carpenter, a most worthy man, held in the highest esteem because of his honesty, industry, sobriety and the fact that he owned one of the neatest and best houses in the town, and was a thrifty and good citizen generally.

"How do you do, Miss Pickerell," he said cheerily.

"I'm very well, thank you," replied Miss 'Rindy, concealing her paper and pencil in some confusion.

"Glad to hear it," said Mr. Hall heartily. No, thank you; I won't lay off my overcoat. I just run in on a little matter of business. It's about that bay window I hear you want to put in."

Miss 'Rindy, in a greater confusion than ever, made haste to say:

"Oh. Mr. Hall; somebody must have made a mistake. I'm not going to put in a bay window. I would if I could; but I haven't the means to do it with and I don't think I ever shall have."

"That's all right," said Mr. Hall heartily, producing a tape line and rule. "But if you'll kindly allow me to I'll just take the measure for that window all the same," and before Miss 'Rindy could recover from her bewildering surprise, he added in a more sober tone:

"Miss 'Rindy, when my poor wife lay sick so long two years ago you was one of the best and kindest friends she had. She often said so herself. She said you did more to make her last days happy and peaceful than any one else but me in the world. She remembered and blest you in her last hours, and I shall always remember what you did for us then and for my little boy and girl whose true freind you have been to this day.

"I've often wanted to do something to show you I was grateful, and I've intended to all along. But you know I've been away a great deal of late and it was only the other day I heard about that little bay window plan of yours that's worried you so long. Wish I'd known of it before. Seems to me I've heard you speak of it, but it kind of escaped my mind.

"And now I've come to put that window in. It's wonderful fine weather for it, and it can all be put in in a day by having most of the work done at the shop. Now don't you say a word, Miss Pickerell. I'm going to put that window in whither or no, and you can call it a Christmas gift if you want to."

"Why, Mr. Hall—John!"

She had known him all her life, but it was only because of her excitement that she called him "John."

"He instantly rejoined, "It's all right, 'Rindy; all right. You can say John if you're a mind to, and I——"

But Miss 'Rindy had disappeared. Abashed, but happy to her heart's depths, she had fled from the room and into her own chamber where the simple soul fell on her knees and thanked the Lord again and again for that bay window.

I am always unfortunate in my love stories. I will "let the cat out of the bag," as Miss 'Rindy would say, before I want to. And this is to end as a love story. Any one with half an eye can see that. It has been glaringly evident ever since she called him "John" and he called her "'Rindy." I hoped to bring this out as a sort of delightful little surprise to all my readers, and I hope still that you are all surprised—surprised and glad.

It took John Hall a remarkably long time to put that bay window in, considerering the fact that he said the work could all be done in a day. He was ten whole days at it—or something else.

It was not until the window was completed and the plants and pictures, and canary birds were in it that the actual proposal came.

Miss 'Rindy sat in the bay window at the time, an advantage John Hall considered well and availed himself of. He knew she would be to happy to say him nay if she sat in the bay window when he proposed.

She said yes, simply, tearfully and without insulting her womanly modesty, I may add gratefully. He need never know it.

They kept their secret better then I have kept it. Not a soul of all the villagers had the faintest suspicion of its real import when Miss 'Rindy went from house to house inviting her nearest friends to come to her house on the evening of Christmas day.

And they all came. The little house was full. The pretty bay window, flower-bedecked and lace-curtained, was admired to Miss 'Rindy's heart's content.

At half-past 8 she suddenly disappeared into her own room and closed the door behind her.

At nine she stepped shyly forth, transformed into what one of the old ladies present called "the most comfortable looking bride."

Her old black cashmere worn in the early part of the evening, had been exchange for the neatest and most becoming grey silk, with bands of real lace at the neck and sleeves. There were pink and white rosebuds at her throat and in her hair, and a very pink rose on either cheek as John Hall stepped forth and took her hand to lead her to the bay window.

And there they were married, "before any of us could get our senses," said one of the guests.

"It was the biggest kind of a surprise and 'Rindy looked about as much surprised as anybody."

Indeed she said herself long afterward that she "couldn't hardly realize it yet."

"To think," she said simply, "of having that blessed bay window after all and such a dear, good man as John Hall throwed in with it. Indeed I might say four bay windows, for there's that many in John's house and we're going to move in there in the spring. I just couldn't move out of my own little house until I'd set awhile in my own bay window and seen all the things I always said I'd see from it. What a blessed Christmas it was for me when I got John and the window for my gifts."

—Zenas Dane, in Daughters of America.

Already Provided.

From a Washington Letter.

One thing that Mrs. Harrison will find is a completely furnished house—solid silver, the finest of china, linen for the table, and bed-chambers, elegant furnishings in the parlors and fairly good in the private parts of the house. The private dining-room is on the first floor, just across the hall from the state dining-room. This is the only room on the first floor used by the family of the President. The parlors are used for callers, and the entire family or "living" rooms are on the second floor. There are, perhaps, half a dozen of these, scarcely more; a sitting-room or two next to the circular "library-room," where the President sits during his business and working hours, and several handsomely furnished bed-rooms and dressing-rooms. An elevator carries the family down-stairs at meal-time, and when they go down for other purposes if they desire it, but as a rule they walk up and down the broad, easy and luxuriantly carpeted stairs and through the handsome and always attractive corridors which lead the way to the dining-rooms and parlors on the first floor. There they find everything ready, for the experienced steward is able to relieve the mistress of the White House of all cares of housekeeping—if he is well paid for it.

Tattooing Convicts.

A Buffalo (N. Y.) prison official is quoted as saying that the latest fad in prison management is tattooing. "It is a ready means of identification," he adds, "and is bound to become popular in prison management. My idea is to tattoo a convict every time he is imprisoned, and then we'll have his record as clear as the moon at midnight. Let each penal institution adopt a different mark or monogram and the problem of identifying convicts will be solved. It is the simplest and best system yet proposed. To some persons it may seem as harsh as branding, but it isn't. Tattooing isn't painful, and the marks could be put on the convict's back, arms or legs, and would not embarrass reformed convicts.

The Legend of the Black Mountain.

In the south of the city of Cork, and forming the boundary of the Catholic parishes of Ballygarvan and Ballymarde lies Duibhe Shliabh (Anglice, the Black mountain) which is said to be, since the annihilation of the Fiann Eirionn at Gabhra (now Garristown, county Dublin,) by the Ard Righ Cairbre Mac Art; the residence of the celebrated Dannonian Princess Deirdre, who was up to that period the trusted female messenger of Fionn Mac-Cumhall. After his death she fled far from the scene of his fall to this mountain, where she must stay (according to popular belief, until Erin regains once more the prestige which she once held among the nations of the earth. Or as the Bard would say—

"Through all error and confusion
Till she set the clear conclusion
Standing like a queen alone,
All things adverse overthrown."

There is scarcely a fireside from South Gate Bridge to Clonakilty, that has not witnessed eager groups listening some time or other to the many generous acts which Deirdre has bestowed on her midnight votaries, since the year 284 A. D., when she first took up her abode in the mountain up to the present. A few of the tales told on such occasions may not be uninteresting to the generality of my readers.

On a certain July night in the year 1426, John De Barra accompanied by his only son Patrick left Kinsale with some swine, which they intended to sell at Cork on the morrow. The market was then at Fatha na Croithe, and not at Goll an Spurra, where it lies at present,

However, when they came as far as Drochad ui Naoi, the father bade the son to return home, as he could himself drive the swine for the remainder of the journey. According they parted as the morning was beginning to dawn on the rim of the distant horizon. The young man, instead of going back the road he had come, took a shorter route across the Black Mountain. Scarcely had he reached the summit, ere he saw approaching him a maid of the lovliest aspect, on whose head was placed a crown of the rarest emeralds. Entranced he stood gazing on the lovely form, when she presently exclaimed in a mild angelic voice:

"Young man, thy name is Patrick De Barra—thou hast come from Kinsale with thy father, who has journeyed on to Cork, with seventeen fat swine. I say, immediately follow after him, for he will sadly need thee. Take this staff in thy hand, and keep it as a memento of me. While thou hast it thou wilt be the most powerful man throughout lovely Erin. But do not further delay, thy father needeth thee. Farewell! I am Deirdre of the Black Mountain."

Immediately that she spoke the concluding words, she disappeared as if by magic; and sorely bewildered, Patrick De Barra retraced his foot steps and followed his father to Cork. When he reached the market at Fatha na Croithe, he found his father well-nigh dead from the effect of a beating given him by a few drunken individuals, with whom he had quarreled, relative to the price of swine. Seeing his father in such a plight, he charged with the staff of Deirdre, all in the market, and succeeded in utterly routing and dispersing them—the innocent as well as the guilty.

After some difficulty he succeeded in gathering together his father's swine and sold them at a good reasonable price, to a friend of his, who lived at Barrack street. Then after procuring a drink of nut brown ale for his worthy parent, that individual recovered from the effects of his drubbing, and soon after both took their departure for Kinsale. In the journey home, the young man related to his astonished and delighted parent the boon conferred on him by the mysterious woman, whom he had met that morning on the summit of the Black Mountain.

From thence forward he was the strongest man found in Erin; and tradition informs us, that he succeeded on more occasions than one, in administering chastisement on the haughty Norman De Courceys of Kinsale, who vainly endeavored during his lifetime to gain by foul means, possession of his vast estates.

Such is one specimen of Deirdre's generosity. The following also exhibits her good nature, but in a different manner.

On a cold December night in the 1699, Patrick MacGearalt was taking a short cut towards home through the Black Mountains; but he accidentally lost his way in the darkness of night. He kept wandering about for a few hours vainly endeavoring to regain the path from which he had parted, but his efforts were of no avail, until eventually he beheld a magnificent castle a short distance from him—the walls of which reflected the different hues of the rainbow. He advanced boldly up to it, where it was met by a watchman of a very diminutive size; being scarcely two feet in height; who wore a red breeches, yellow waistcoat, green jacket, and a cap in which were blended the three colors, with remarkable distinctness. They both kindly saluted each other, after which the little gentleman ushered Patrick into the presence of the owner of the castle—a young woman of rare beauty. She bade him be seated and rest till morning, as the night was cold and bitter without.

With her request he instantly complied, being more than glad to do so, as he was nearly benumbed with cold and fatigue. Supper was then laid before him and his little friend whose acquaintance he had made at the gate; and when he had eaten his sufficient, he was supplied—this time by the hostess—with a measure of pure sparkling wine, which made him somewhat hilarious.

Being naturally of a poetic temperament, he launched forth into a flood of melody, in praise of the generosity of his fair hostess, and also of her various charms, and asked was she Deirdre of Ulster, that caused such commotion on account of her matchless beauty.

In the same noble strain did she reply, that she was not Deirdre of Ulster, but Deirdre, of the Black Mountain, who at a remote period had been the trusted messenger of the brave and powerful Fionn Mac Cumhall who had lost his life through treachery, at the sanguinary battle of Gabbra. "After his death," said she, "I came to live in this mountain, where I an to stay until

"Erin shall be free, from the center to the sea,
In the years that yet shall be."

"That is until the legislators of our country shall sit—after their liberties have been taken from them by fraud, and ultimately won back by them under a brave and trusted leader—to make laws for the government of their dear country. When that glad time comes, then I must speed away to Garvach—a mountain by the Lee where I must stay forever after."

After this, the little gateman, who had been an attentive listner to all that was spoken between Patrick and his fair hostess, showed the former where he should pass the night. Accordingly he retired to rest, and fell into a sound and peaceful slumber; but when he awoke on the morrow he found himself not in a bed of down in a beautiful castle, but stretched on the heather, on the summit of the Black Mountain.

A Queen's Household.

Queen Victoria's household, says Good Housekeeping, has nearly a thousand officers, subordinates and attendants. The Lord Steward is at the head of all with a salary of $10,000 a year. All officers and servants, except those connected with the Queen's, chamber, stable and chapel, are subject to his orders. The active duties of this officer are performed by the Master of the Household, who gets $5,790 a year. The Lord Treasurer ranks next to the Lord Steward and acts for him in case he is absent, while to assist him he has the Comptroller of the Householder, who likewise does nothing. The Board of Green Cloth, composed of the four above named officials, adjudicates on offences committed in certain parts of the palace, and has clerks and secretary. The clerk of the kitchen and his clerks keep accounts, check goods and give orders to tradespeople.

There is a chief and many cooks a heard of the confectionary department, of the "ewer" or linen department, a chief butler, table deckers, men in charge of the plate, pantry and of the coal, and lamp lighters and dispensers of alms. The Lord Steward is judge of the Court of Marshalsea, with power to dispense justice among the Queen's domestic servants, and the court has a Knight Marshal. The Lord Chamberlain gets $10,000 a year and, with the Vice Chamberlain, superintend all the officers and servants of the Queen's chambers, except the bed chambers, these being under the Groom of the State, as well as the officers of the wardrobe. The keeper of Her Majesty's Privy Purse is her financial secretary at a salary of $10,000. There are the Mistress of the Robes; Ladies of the Bed Chambers, Maids of Honor, bed chamber women, Lords in Waiting, Grooms in Waiting; Gentlemen Ushers of the Privy Chamber, Daily Waiters, Quarterly Waiters, Grooms of the Privy Chambers, Grooms the Great Chamber and Gentleman of the Privy Chamber. The Marshal of Ceremonies must have an absolute knowledge of Court etiquette.

The official places many of them call for no performance of duty, because with the change of customs the duties have become obsolete. The Master of the Tennis Court does nothing. There are a Master of the House, burgomaster, keeper of the swans, and hundreds of assistants to the officers mentioned. All this looks like keeping house under difficulties, and Queen Victoria ought to be well paid for it.

Wedded an Heiress, Drives a Mule.

St. Louis Globe Democrat.

A few weeks ago the Chicago papers contained accounts of the elopement of Miss Roach, the nineteen-year old daughter of a millionaire capitalist of that city, with a young clerk named Cunningham. The young lady, it seems, was a social belle, and the marraige created the usual nine days' gossip in a large circle of friends and acquaintances. After marriage the young couple came to Kansas City and for a few days boarded at a leading hotel. Their money running out and no remittances coming from the wealthy but irate father, Cunningham was forced to seek work. All the work he could find to do was as a street-car driver, and he is now swinging the whip over a pair of metropolitan mules, and his little wife is keeping house in a humble little home on Charlotte street. When she becomes of age in two years she will have a fortune in her own right. It seems that the irate father is beginning to relent, for the other day he sent the young woman a check for $50, with a promise of more on Christmas.

Her Lock of Hair.

From Brownsburg, Ind., comes the story that a young lady sent a note to a discarded lover requesting the return of a lock of hair which, during his courtship, he had clipped from her dainty tresses. His reply was brief and to the point. Rummaging his trunk he collected a number of tresses culled from various "best girls" during his love making career, and forwarded them in a bundle to the girl, inclosing a note to the effect that he had really forgotten which was hers, but she might select it from those forwarded and return the rest at her convenience. They don't speak now as they pass by.

"A LITTLE CHILD SHALL LEAD THEM."

BY ANNIE FOSTER.

CHAPTER I.

Christmas Day had come, and in a few minutes would be gone for aye, for the midnight hour was dealing out its twelve even steady strokes from the ivy-grown tower of the old Catholic church where yesternight, at the same time, the glorious Mass of the Nativity was being sung with all the beautiful ritual that belongs of right to a service one is so rarely privileged to assist at in these days. Waltham Hall, a grand old mansion adjoining the church, had been all day long bright and gay with the Christmas rejoicings, but now most of the guests who were staying in the house had retired. In the library the master of the homestood confronting his only brother, just two years his junior. He, the elder, James Faverche, folded his arms, and still keeping his eyes fixed on his brother's face, said, with his voice full of fury: "Tell it me again, if you dare, you scoundrel." Bernard's countenance wore a pained yet startled look, and his voice shook somewhat—not with fear, but emotion, as he questioned:—

"James, why are you like this? I came to you first with my happiness, even before telling our mother.'

"And how dare you flaunt your happiness in my face when you have wrecked mine?"

"How have I wrecked yours? Do you not know me well enough to to know that your happiness is as much to me as my own?"

"You lie! Supplanter!"

"You are my brother, and I will not give you back the lie," Bernard said, and his fair face grew deadly pale as he struggled inwardly to curb his temper; but James was not master of himself, his naturally hasty temper was no longer under control, and he poured out a torrent of wild words, even such as a madman might use. Why did the day of all days in the year set in such a storm of strife between these two brothers? Or rather, why did the elder give way to such a gush of passion worthy only of one who no longer held the reins of reason? To answer these questions we must digress somewhat from our story.

A half-a-mile from Waltham Hall, just on the other side of the belt of woodland that bounded the park on the east side, stood Alverstan Chase that for long ages had belonged to the Alverstans; there were Alverstans who helped to beat back the Danes into the North Sea, Alverstans who stood staunch to the House of Cerdic, Alverstans that the Norman Conquerer found it wiser to propitiate than to crush, Alverstans who through every change that came upon their country, remained true to their Faith and loyal to their Monarch. For some years, now, the last of that long line was a female, Margaret Rene Alverstan, who since the death of her father had been under the guardianship of the late master of Waltham Hall and his wife. After Margaret's education had been completed, she had resided alternately with relatives on her mother's side and with the Faverches, in accordance with the wishes of her deceased parent; she had, as one may naturally suppose, seen a good deal of the sons of her guardians, and had learned to look upon them as brothers; not as a sister, however, had the two brothers regarded her recently, though each of them had so carefully guarded his secret that when Bernard sought his brother on Christmas night and asked him to congratulate him on having won Maggie's affections, he was not prepared for the wild outburst of anger with which his communication was received.

James's anger at length seemed to have spent itself, but he still stands with tightly folded arms like one who seems to fear what he might be tempted to do if he unloosed them. He is tall and dark, with clear-cut regular features and keen eyes, which at the present moment are all aglow with the fire that is raging within him. Of the two, he is the handsomest, but his face lacks the softer lines that lend a charm to Bernard's face. The set of his lips at all times is firm—that kind of firmness which can degenerate into hardness, and makes its possessor, in the long run, hardest of all to himself. The curve of his nostrils tells how pride is a passion unconquered within him—this latter has ever been the line so marked between the brothers that all who knew them have acquiesced in the saying so common about their home—"Mr. James is a thorough chip of the old block, and so is Mr. Bernard; but Mr. Bernard's not proud like his brother." Perhaps never before in all their lives had the contrast been so marked as it is now—marked as it will never be again. A log of wood on the wide hearth sends forth a brighter glow, and the gleam from the fire-place lights up the low-ceiled library and gives a warmer tone to the deep red curtains, and the richly-bound books look richer in the wood-fire's gleam. The silence is growing painful to one at least—to Bernard—who can almost hear his own heart beat; the clock on the mantel-piece chimes half after mid-night. "Who speaks first?" they seem to be inwardly asking.

"James," and Bernard's voice has a quiver in it. "James, if I had only known that you cared for Queenie, I would not have come home for Christmas. I wish I had gone to the other side of the world before I had come here to wound you."

"And I—I wish you were not my brother! I could kill you as you stand there. O God, that I should have lived to wish to see you dead!"

"James, do not let us talk any more like this. I will see Queenie in the morning and tell her I mistook my feelings for her, then I will go away for a few years, and she perhaps, will learn to love you, and then, brother, you will not think so hardly of me."

These generous words touched the passion-torn man, but pride lay uppermost, and he would not yield.

"And do you think I would stoop to sue for what another has cast aside, and that one of my own kin? No. If I had won her first she would have been all mine own. Now she has listened to you I could never be anything to her. In a few days you may join Alverstan Chase to Waltham, for I shall be a wanderer henceforth."

"James, I beseech you by all I can think of not to talk like this. It is not twenty-four hours yet since we knelt in the church, not fifty paces from where we are standing—knelt side by side, too, and took into our hearts the Prince of Peace. For His sake—the God-Man—I entreat you to be at peace with me. I shall tell Queenie all, and leave it to her. What ever my future may be, this night, unless we are reconciled now, will always hang its shadow before me."

"And so you show me up to her—I cannot say her name—show me up as the brother who was a murderer in his heart."

There was a mocking tone in his voice, and the younger brother shuddered as he answered:

"God forbid I should thus wrong you—your honor is safe with me; I should be unworthy of the name of brother if I told Queenie aught save that you love her even as I do, and then leave our fate in her hands. It is useless for us to prolong this interview; say good night, James," and Bernard held out his hand, but James turned away his head and would not take the outstretched hand nor answer his brother. The latter went out of the library, took up a bedroom candlestick, and having lit the candle, crossed the hall back towards the library, but passed by the door and went down a corridor that ran along by one side of the library; at the end of this corridor he drew aside a heavy crimson curtain and passed into the church. Where the ever-burning lamp shed its clear, tiny light he knelt, and there, for how long he never knew, he poured forth his heart's bitter cry to the Prisoner of Love; the air grew colder, but he heeded it not; he was chilled to the very marrow, for he was in evening dress, but he knelt on. In an arched recess, not three yards from him, lay the stone effigy of a Walter de Faverche; above it hung the helmet, shield, and iron gloves that the Crusader had worn in battle; perchance that same Walter had kept his vigil there on the eve of his knighthood, had prayed and vowed on the worn altar steps where Bernard knelt fighting for another's soul; praying with all the deep, generous fervor of his nature for his brother, and offering, too, with his whole soul, to forego the happiness of his lifetime if God so willed it. Outside the wind howled and shrieked and drove a blinding snowstorm over hills and woods, piled up long, white ridges on the far-reaching moor, and swathed the bared trees, and the ivy-clad church, and the old hall of the Faverches in its soft shroud. Inside the church, the little star of light burnt on, and unseen angels bent in lowly admiration where their Lord had willed to dwell; and the white marble monuments the while looked startling ghostly.

Bernard has prayed before the tabernacle as he has never prayed before, and as he may probably never pray again. Cold and stiff he rises, his face is grey, seen by the candle which he lights once more as he leaves the church. As he raises his hand to draw aside the curtain he turns his head.. Ah! there is the crib—the crib that he had helped his brother to make—and there were the flowers that Queenie had placed about it, and the feathery ferns that looked as though they had grown into the wood-work. Till now he had kept manly though his trouble, but the sight of the crib was too much for him. He threw himself down beside it and sobbed as he had never sobbed since his only baby sister died so many years ago.

CHAPTER II.

It was past mid-day before Bernard had an opportunity of speaking to Queenie alone. He had said nothing to his mother thus far, for he did not wish to cloud, in the slightest degree, the festive season of the year. Queenie, or, as Mrs. Faverche generally called her, Maggie, was more astonished, if possible, at Bernard's revelation, than he had been at his brother's violent outburst; she was, however, a genuine girl, and said at once in her frank way:—"Bernard, I am so sorry; I really like James, but so very differently; do you think he would like me to—I mean—can I say something kind to him?"

"Yes, do. Just in your old way; poor old fellow. Queenie, do you think it would be very hard for you to turn about, dear, and learn to like James the same as you do me? It would make him happy.

She looked puzzled. What did Bernard mean. Had he mistaken his feelings for her, and was he to honorable to say so? But she answered him calmly.

"You see—or perhaps you do not see—that James could never be Bernard, or Bernard James; or if Bernard were nowhere, James would be still where he is."

"That is enough; I am satisfied."

Here an interruption came, in the form of a couple of young people intent upon getting up a snow-balling match, or Queenie would have asked a question or two as to why Bernard had grown so serious-looking since yesterday. As she ran off to put on proper gear for the out-door game, she suddenly remembered that she had not seen James that day, she recollected hearing a servant deliver a message to his mother to the effect that Mr. Faverche would breakfast in his room as he had some writing to do.

Snow-balling was in full swing when James Faverche walked to the window of his study to see what all the merry laughter and shouting meant. Was he in any better mood? Well, he had spent a good many hours in writing and setting papers in order, but that was nothing new with him, for since his father's death he had taken a good deal of the management of the estate into his own hands. Last night has not, so far as one can judge from outward appearances, left any remnant on his face, beyond a firmer set about the mouth, which his moustache fails to hide. It was evident that he had laid down for himself some line of action, and whatever it was, he would certainly carry it out. So much anyone acquainted with what had taken place could not fail to perceive. Inwardly, his feelings towards his brother were not what they had been during those dark hours of the past night, but they were very far from being the brotherly feelings that used to live in his breast. He wondered somewhat to himself as he watched the players below, how in such a short time he could have changed so, for his better nature seemed stamped out of him, but pride held her demon-sway, and he would not wrench himself free, and acknowledge that self, and self only was to blame. He envied his brother with a deep and bitter envy as he saw him in the midst of the game. Ah! little did he know of that brother's lonely vigil—little did he know of the deep shadow he had flung across his soul! He went back to his writing-table and took up his pen, but he could not finish what he was engaged on without the help of another document; that he must seek for in the library. He had avoided going there all the morning because he neither wished to meet his brother nor Queenie. He went down, found what he wanted, and was just leaving the library when Queenie ran up against him; it was an unexpected meeting to both. For a minute neither spoke; the girl was the first to regain her presence of mind; she held out her hand and said, "Good morning." James pretended not to see her hand, but Queenie would not see the pretence. "Shake hands, James, there's a good fellow"—then suddenly recollecting herself she said, as he took her hand, blushing as she did so.

"James, you will always be good friends with me, won't you?"

"Do you see any reason for me to be otherwise?"

"You answer my question with a question; why do you?"

"Now you follow suit."

"Bernard told me, James; I am sorry, but I am so glad to be so near to you—I mean for Bernard to be so near you, because you will show him how to manage Alverstan."

"Bernard and you will get along well enough without my help."

This was said in a tone altogether new to the girl. She looked into his face and it seemed to her as if it had changed since yesterday—she had never seen him look just like that, never remembered just that set hard tone of voice, and a chill settled down upon her and she felt as one feels when you step out of a warm room into the outer air saturated with fog. She spoke again:—

"James, I am sure Bernard and I will often need and expect you to help us along."

"We shall see."

"You are angry, and I don't know why, and oh! I thought you would be so glad, you have always been so nice and kind," and a sob rose into her voice.

"I am busy," he said, and passed on.

There was no more snow-balling for Queenie that day. Instinctively and without at all thinking what she was doing, she turned and went along the same corridor Bernard passed down last night—the private entrance to the church used only by the family.

On the third day after Christmas Day, James Faverche announced to his mother that important business required his presence in London, and begged her to excuse him to their guests. A telegram that he had received that morning supplied a sufficient reason for his departure. Bernard, however, was not so easily satisfied, more especially as James had chosen a time for going when all the younger guests were away skating on the mere; this looked as if he did not wish to take a proper leave of the betrothed, and truth to say such was the case. Of course the mother knew nothing whatever of the sore point between the brothers, and when an opportunity had offered she had expressed herself to her oldest son as being very pleased about the arrangement; most of all because Bernard would not give up all thought of following his profession as a barrister, not that he was without independent means, but he had chosen his calling out of deference to his father's wishes, who had no fancy for either of his sons to lead an idle life. James had been for five years in the Civil Service in India, and only gave it up when his father's declining health necessitated his presence at home. A week, ten days, passed away, and business still kept James in London; the eleventh morning after his departure brought rather a long letter to his mother. He had written to her very frequently, but not at any length. We will not give the epistle entire, only a quotation or two:—

"My old post, or rather a higher post that I should have reached had I remained a short time longer in India, has suddenly become vacant. I have a liking for India, and, what is more I cannot bring my mind to the idea of vegetating in a country place at present—that will do for me when I begin to find out I have got a liver; so to India I have decided to go, and am up to the elbows getting my outfit. If possible, I will run down at the last moment, but do not think me unkind should that not prove practicable—you know I am not fond of good-byes; in the meantime, I have written to Brett and told him what things I wish him to prepare and send on to Southampton. He will join me here on Friday and, I hope, will accompany me; if not, I should wish him to be retained at Waltham. Andrews is getting into years, and must soon give up his place. Brett, as you know has been a great help to him and will fit in admirably; nevertheless, I should much prefer his going with me."

James Faverche never went home to say good-by—he had never intended to do so. He had heard of the vacant post in India a day or two before Christmas, and had determined to apply for it after his stormy interview with his brother. If he had wished to cast a deeper shadow over his brother's happiness he could not possibly have done so in any better, or worse, way, but both Bernard and Queenie, though they knew well enough in their hearts why he had put so many thousands miles between them, never referred to the cause, besides, Queenie was in total ignorance of what had taken place on Christmas night. Bernard had never meant his brother to leave England without being reconciled to him, so when he felt that James had no intention of returning to the North, he hurried to London, only to find that his brother was already far on the way, the ship having left Southampton twenty-four hours or more. Poor Bernard! He crushed his hat on his head as he turned away from the hotel, and hailing a cab, drove to his chambers. Snow was falling fast, and a keen wind was driving it into the horse's face and almost blinding him; but Bernard noticed none of this, his heart was chill within him, and when he thought of this time ever after, he verily believed that if the cabman had driven him into the Thames he should not have heeded it. This day's snowfall added considerably to the previous fall in the North, where for weeks the earth lay shrouded, but in the deep hollows where the sun could not peep, the drifted snow lingered far on into the spring, and so all the early flowers were long in waking to life and sweetness; but when the trees were blossom-laden, the lovers pledged their troth—"until death do us part"—in the church where dead and gone Faverches slept their peaceful sleep. The wedding was a quiet one, the villagers of Waltham and Alverstan did the rejoicing. Away in India, a man, cold and silent, went through his daily duties, and steeled his heart to every generous thought. He would not say, or even think a blessing for the two whose lives were linked with his. Was he happy? Far from it. Happiness and he had shaken hands, and pride had watched the parting and registered it as good, while his conscience gnawed away and would not be at rest.

CHAPTER III.

"Queenie, you must break it gently to mother, not that she is easily thrown off the balance, but she is getting into years and is not over strong."

It was Bernard who spoke just seventeen years after the Christmas Day of the beginning of our story, and it was his brother's return that he wished to be gently told to the mother—the brother who during all those years had rejected every overture from Bernard and his wife to heal the breach between them—the brother who had returned to his old home without a word of warning to have it prepared for his reception; for some years now it had been left entirely to the care of two or three old servants, for the elder Mrs. Faverche had yielded to the wishes of her younger son and gone to live with them; they could not bear to leave her in her loneliness, and she was happy at Alverstan.

"O, Bernard," replied his wife, "if we could but bring about a reconciliation somehow. I did pray so hard before the Crib this morning, that at any cost it might be affected."

"It has been years to wait, and pray, but the reconciliation, I feel will come, but how? We cannot send or go to James, he would certainly resent it."

"We must pray more and get the children to join us, and then the reconciliation will surely come."

"What is a econcation, papa?"

Unseen by either of the parents they had had a little listener—their youngest child, a girl, who was a very privileged little body; and because she was the only girl seemed to have the range of the whole house; she was just a little spoilt, too, but not enough to make her that truly horrible household pest that a real spoilt child generally is.

The child repeated her question, and Bernard, speaking to his wife in French, said: "You had better explain."

So the mother took her little four-year-old on her knee and began:—

"You know, Renee, you went into the kitchen yesterday after I had told you not to go—"

"I wanted to see the big gooses, mamma," broke in the child.

"Yes, but it was naughty, because I had told you not to go and so I was not pleased with you, then you got very sorry and unhappy and you wanted to be mamma's good little girl again, and you asked papa to let you pick me a flower, and when you brought me the flower it was all right again, and so that was a reconciliation."

The little one looked serious for a minute or so and then questioned, "Did Uncle James do something grannie told him not to?"

"No, but father did something Uncle James did not want him to do."

The Alverstan children had been brought up to love their uncle, and hard though he was to his brother, that same brother had kept his name a household word amongst them; the boys believed him to be a regular hero, though perhaps a bit eccentric.

The little girl spoke again.

"Then papa was naughty; let me take Uncle James some pretty flowers and then that will make econciation."

The child's thought was no sooner expressed than both parents eagerly seized the idea looking upon it as the finger of God pointing out what should be done. Bernard took the child into the conservatory that opened into his wife's morning room, and holding Renee in his arms let her little fingers break the blossoms as she would, and never before had fingers made such havoc there; her mother held the basket to receive the flowers, and when the little maid was satisfied with her work she said:—

"That will do, now you must put some white wool over them to keep them warm."

A half an hour after Renee and her nurse were walking up to a side entrance of Waltham Hall; the latter had been instructed as to what she was to do, at the door she was received by Mrs. Andrews, the housekeeper, to whom she delivered her master's message.

A large wood fire burnt on the hearth of the library, and there, partly turned towards its bright glow, sat James Faverche. He heard a tap on the door and someone entered. Without moving round his head he said:—"I did not ring Mrs. Andrews, and I do not want to be disturbed." No one answered. It was Mrs. Andrews who opened the door, but only to put Renee into the room. The child walked up straight to her uncle, who sat looking into the heart of the fire. With a great start he turned to see whence the voice came that asked:—

"Are you Uncle James?"

Standing close beside him was a little child clad in scarlet, with a sweet rosy face framed in some soft, white woolen material. Was it the Queenie of the old days come back again? He was not superstitious, but an uncanny feeling crept over him. He forgot for the moment his brother had a little girl born some years after his sons. The child repeated her question.

"Are you Queenie, little maid?" he asked back.

"No, I,s Renee; papa calls mamma Queenie. Are you Uncle James?"

"Why do you want to know?"

"Cause I's come to make econciation."

"What does that big word mean, little one? and what have you got in your basket?"

The latter half of the uncle's question prevented Renee's explanation, and she lifted the cotton wool and showed her uncle some beautiful flowers.

"I got everyone my own self for you. Nobody told me. Do you like pretty flowers?"

"Why did you pick the flowers for me?"

"Oh, 'cause I love you."

"Love me, child? You never knew me till a minute or two ago."

"You live in papa's room, and I know you ever since I 'member."

Light broke in upon him by degrees. He remembered the bust of himself that Bernard would have years ago. Could it be that his memory had been so cherished? A big lump rose in his throat. Again Renee spoke:

"I said 'Merry Kissmiss' to you this morning when I went to say "Merry Kissmiss'to papa."

It was no good. In spite of himself his hardness fled before the simple words of the child standing by him. He lifted her on his knee and kissed her lovingly, and took up the flowers in her basket and kissed them too. He could not do things by halves; he put out his hand and touched the bell. Mrs. Andrews was not far away, she had lingered near the library door to see what would be the result of the child's visit. When she entered the room, she was surprised at the change that had come over her master. There was actually a smile about his mouth, and his voice was changed, too. The old tone was there, as he said:

"Bring me a vase and some water, please. Look at the lovely flowers my little niece has brought me."

The housekeeper hurried away to get what he wanted and to wipe the tears of gladness that had come into her eyes.

At Alverstan, Bernard and his wife were kneeling in their little chapel, praying still as they had prayed so many years for the reconciliation that had come at last, though they knew it not yet.

Bernard at length, could no longer bear the suspense—he left the house and wandered into the garden. Yes it was his brother coming out of the copse that separated Alverstan from Waltham, and, leading Renee by the hand, he hastened to tell his wife the joyful news, and together they awaited the long-lost, dearly loved brother. We cannot describe the meeting; things like that lose their beauty when they are reduced to dry details of a paper.

Later on in the day James said to Queenie:—

"Do you know how nearly I made a murderer of myself seventeen years ago?"

"I know nothing of you, James, but what is good. you have always been to me a dear brother—the past is nothing."

To Bernard he said:—

"The oldest boy of yours must drop the Alverstan and keep only Faverche, he is my heir, you know."

"Brother, such an idea has never been thought of—we have always hoped, and still hope, you will marry some day."

"I have intended what I say ever since I knew he was born. But now I must go home. I have something of greater importance to do before I sleep to-night. I have been reconciled to my brother, and now I can make my peace with God: for seventeen years I have never entered a church."

There is nothing more to add, only, no happier family slept that night than those who laid their heads to rest beneath the roof of Alverstan Chase. Love had prevailed; Hate had vanished; for verily "a little child did lead them."

A young married couple started housekeeping, and hired a young woman of Hibernian extraction to attend to the 'general housework.' She was a gem—the acme of neatness, Bspatch and culinary proficiency, dut she broke her young mistress' heart on the second day by climbing the stairs to the parlor during the call of a social acquaintance, and in a voice about as melodious as a fish-horn, inquiring: "Say, Boss, what time does Frank come home to dinner?"

Smut in Corn.

Every farmer knows what is meant by corn smut. It has been made a study by different persons, and among them the celebrated agriculturist, Henry Stewart, and the main points which he has determined are that this parasite—as it is considered such by investigators—enters the plant at the roots and from the soil; that it is much encouraged from the continuous growth of corn upon the same land; that the refuse, smutty stalks should be carefully gathered and burned, to destroy the spores and prevent the stocking of the soil with them; that if permitted to go into the manure the parasite is thus sown upon the land, where it is likely to remain until a new crop is planted; that if the smutty corn or fodder is fed the spores will pass through the the animal unharmed and go into the manure, and that these spores are not likely to spread from one field to another through the circulating air. The mature smut of corn bears a close resemblance to the mature puff-ball, and we cannot see why the spores might not be distributed quite largely by the wind. It is claimed that there are no remedies when once it develops in corn, and that the only successful treatment is to cut or pull all corn that shows signs of smut and cause its destruction. If such a course was pursued by all farmers smut might in process of time be wholly eradicated.—Germantown Telegraph.

Curing Pork.

The meat is not fit for salting until free from animal heat, and yet it should not be frozen in the least, as this condition prevents the salt penetrating it. Cover the bottom of the barrel with salt to the depth of three inches, then pack the strips of pork in circles, the rind facing the barrel, but with a deposition of salt intervening and a stratum of salt upon each layer of pork. When the middlings are salted prepare a brine sufficient to well cover the pork, using all the salt that the water will dissolve. Bring to the boil, skim, and when cold pour over the salted pork. A well-adjusted cover is a necessary part of a pork barrel.

Trim the hams and rub them over with salt, to extract the blood. In two days apply the following pickle: One and a half pounds of salt and a pound of brown sugar to each gallon of water, and an ounce of saltpeter to 100 pounds of meat; bring to a boil, skim, and pour over when cold. Hams should remain in the pickle from four to six weeks. In packing don't let them press against each other; they are likely to taint at the bone before becoming thoroughly salted. Those skilled in the curing of hams remove them from one barrel to another twice a week until the curing is partially completed, to prevent tainting at the bone.

Pure gold always has its base imitation. It is so with Salvation Oil, which is worth its weight in gold to all sufferers from rheumatism, neuralgia, or gout. See that you get the genuine. 25 cents.

"Deeper than e'er plummet sounded" some people's coughs seem to come from, yet a bottle of Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup will cure them. It goes away down to the bottom of matters and works wonders. Pleasant to take and good for coughs, colds, croup, bronchitis, etc. Price 25 cents.

Fred Hansen of Gilman, Pierce county, Wis., while at work in the woods near Woodville, was struck by the falling limb of a tree and killed. He was twenty-two years of age.

The old question—where shall I get my seed this year—presents itself again to thousands of our readers at this season of the year. If you will turn to our advertising columns you will find the announcement of John A. Salzer, La Crosse, Wis., who makes a specialty of Northern Grown Seeds. These are early, productive and full of life, and will increase every yield.

Mrs. Swarthout, a photographer, has been arrested at Reed City, Mich., for maltreating her niece. She is charged with having tied the girl's legs with a stout cord and then putting in a stick and turning the cord until the child would become almost unconscious with pain. She would also cord her tongue in the same manner until the skin bursted. Mrs Swarthout has been bound over to the text term of court, and in default of $1,000 bail languishes in jail.

The New York Daily Graphic has changed hands and also changed politics. It announced that hereafter it would be Republican in politics, and strongly in favor of a protective tariff.

"Consumption can be Cured."

Dr. J. S. Combs, Owensville, Ohio, says: "I have given Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil with Hypophosphites to four patients with better results than seemed possible with any remedy. All were hereditary cases of Lung diseases, and advanced to that stage when Coughs, pain in the chest, frequent breathing, frequent pulse, fever and Emaciation. All these cases have increased in weight 16 to 28 lbs., and are not now needing any medicine.

James Green, a prominent citizen of Wolcott, N. Y., cut his wife's throat and then went to his barn and cut his own. He then returned to the house and gashed his throat again. Neighbors found the bodies near together. Both will die. Domestic troubles was the cause.

The Russian mission to the Vatican has obtained various concessions from the pope. His holiness sanctions the deportations of the bishop of Vilna to Siberia, accepts the Russian government's candidates for the dioceses of Dublin and Pleki and consents to the introduction of the Russian language in all Catholic churches, except in the liturgy, an innovation that will completely destroy the Polish element. It is certain that French influence had much to do with the granting of these concessions.

Two young ladies by the name of Smith were drowned at Hillsville, four miles from East Brady, Pa. They, in company with another girl and two young men, were crossing the stream in a skiff and it sank with them. The bodies have not been recovered. The others of the party were rescued in an exhausted condition.

RATIONALISM.

This is the Great Danger to Religion That Dr. Talmage Sees Ahead at Present.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Dec. 23.—Dr. Talmage took as the subject of his sermon, "A Bad Boil Cured." The text was: "I have heard thy prayer; behold, I will heal thee. And Isaiah said: Take a lump of figs. And they took and laid it on the boil, and he recovered."—II Kings, xx, 5-7.

Luxurious living is not healthy. The second generation of kings and queens and lords and princes is apt to be brainless and invalid. The second crop of grass is almost always short. Royal blood is generally scrofulous. You will not be surprised, then, to hear that King Hezekiah had disorders which broke out in a carbuncle, virulent and deathful. The Lord told him he must die; he did not want to die. He turned his face to the wall, so that his prayer would not be interrupted, and cried to the Lord for his life. God heard the prayer and answered it, saying: "Behold, I will heal thee." But there was humble instrumentality to be employed. This carbuncle needed a "cataplasm." That is a tough word we use to show how much we know. If in the pulpit we always used the words the people understood we never should have any reputation for learning. Well, this carbuncle needed a cataplasm, which is a poultice. Your old mother, who doctored her own children in the time when physicians were not plenty as they are now, will tell you that the very best poultice is a fig, and that was what was used upon the carbuncle of King Hezekiah. The power of God, accompanied by this human instrumentality, cured the king.

In this age of discovery, when men know so much it almost kills them, and write so wisely it almost kills us, it has been found out that prayer to God is a dead failure. All things arranged according to inexorable law. There is no use in praying to God for rain in time of drought. The "weather probabilities" in the morning papers will decide the question, rain or no rain, and the whole nation in prayer before God would not bring down a single drop. I am not not speaking of an imaginary theory, but of that which is believed by ten thousand times ten thousand men.

If sickness comes to your household, it will depend entirely upon ventilation, good diet, and the skill of the doctors, as to whether your child gets well. The father might pray all day and the mother might pray all night—it would not have any effect upon the case. If squills, belladonna, paregoric and gruel do the work, your child will get well; if not, not. There is a cast iron God seated at the head of the universe, holding in the cold grasp of his metal fingers a band of law from which nothing can break away.

Men and Women of God, at this point the great battle of Christianity is to be fought. The great foe of Christianity today is rationalism, that comes out from our schools, and universities, and magazines and newspapers, to scoff at Bible truth and caricature the old religion of Jesus. It says Jesus is not God, for it is impossible to explain how he can be divine and human at the same time; the Bible is not inspired, for there are things in it that they don't like. Regeneration is a farce; there is good enough in us, and the only thing is to bring it out. Development is the word—development. The Garden of Eden is a fairy story, and no more to be believed than the Arabian Nights or Gulliver's Travels or Robinson Crusoe. We all started as baboons, and are blood relations to that hand-organ. Lazarus was not dead when Christ pretended to raise him; he was only playing dead. The water was not changed into wine at the wedding, but Christ brought in some wine that he had found elsewhere to make up the deficiency. Christ did not walk on the sea, but on the shore, so near that is seemed as if he really were on the water.

What is still more alarming is that Christian men dare not meet this ridicule. There is not one Christian man in five that can, unblanched, stand in the presence of all this raillery, saying: "I believe in the whole Bible, and in every single statement it makes." Christian men try to soften the Bible down to suit the skeptics. The skeptics sneer at the dividing of the Red Sea; and the Christian goes to explaining that the wind blew a hurricane from one direction a good while, until all the water piled up; and besides, that it was low water anyhow, and so the Israelities went through without any trouble. Why not be frank and say: "I believe the Lord God Almighty came to the brink of the Red Sea, and with his right arm swung back the billows on the right side, and with his left arm swung back the billows on the left side, and the abashed water stood up hundreds of feet high, while through their glassy walls the sea monsters gazed with affrighted eyes on the passing Israelities?" The rationalist comes to you saying: "How about Jonah and the whale? Do you really believe that fish story?" There were never so many Nantucket fishermen after one whale as there have been rationalists flinging harpoons at the mediterranean sea-monster, and from that one whale they have got enough oil to light 10,000 souls to perdition. A skeptic tells you that Jonah would have been killed in the process of swallowing, and that he could not, anyhow, have lived three days in such close quarters, but would have been smothered by the poor ventilation. How the good Christians immediately go to work and try to explain the whole thing by natural laws, so as to please the rationalists, and say that a whale is an airbreathing fish; that every little while it comes to the surface, and that the whale that swallowed Jonah did the same thing, and thus got a supply for itself and for the prophet. Why not rather say that God can do anything; and he could take Jonah through the whale's throat, although the throat would not have been half large enough ordinarily to let him pass, and could have kept him alive in the whale five years without any air if he had chosen to? Who made the whale? God. Who made Jonah? God. Then he could do anything he pleased with either of them.

The moment you begin to explain about the miraculous and supernatural, you surrender the Bible. Take the supernatural out of the Bible, and you make it a collection of lies and humbugs, in preference to which I choose Aesop's Fables. They are what they pretend to be—fables. But if, after all that the Bible declares, Jesus is not God, and Lazarus was not raised from the dead, and the water was not turned into wine, and the Red Sea was not divided, and in answer to prayer, Hezekiah's boil did not get well, then the Bible is the worst fraud ever perpetrated in God's universe.

Ah! my friends have we been mistaken? Does God hear and answer prayers or does he not? Hezekiah was sick unto death; he prayed for his life: God heard him, and added 15 years to that lifetime. The prayer saved him—the lump of figs applied being merely the God-appointed human instrumentality. "But," says some one, "I don't believe the Bible." Ah! then we will have to part company for four or five minutes, for it is useless to try to argue with any man with whom you cannot stand upon common ground. In any argument, if you would be successful there must be some common data to start from. It is foolish to try to prove to a man that twice three are six, provided he does not admit the multiplication table, or that two and two are four, if he does not admit the addition table. My first address, therefore, is to those who do believe in the Bible. I want to tell you that prayer is the mightiest of all remedies, and that allopathic and homeopathic, and the eclectic schools will yet acknowledge it. Here are two cases of sickness precisely alike; the same kind of medicine is given to both of them, and in the same quantities. The one patient recovers and the other does not. Why? God blesses the one remedy, and does not bless the other. Prayer has helped many a blundering doctor through with a case that would have otherwise become completely unmanageable. There is such a thing as Gospel hygiene, as Christian pharmacy, as divine materia medica. That is a foolish man who, in case of sickness, goes only to human resources, when we have these instances of the Lord's help in the sick room. Before you call the doctor, while he is there, and after he goes away, look up to Him who cured Hezekiah. Let the apothecary send the poultice, but God makes it draw. Oh! I am glad to have a doctor who knows how to pray. God send salvation to all the doctors. Sickness would be often balked, death would be oftener hurled back from the door-sill, if medical men came into the sick room, like Isaiah of the text, with a prescription in their hands, and the word of the Lord in their mouths.

John Abercrombie, the most celebrated physician of Scotland, prayed when he went into the sick room, and he wrote no more about "diseases of the brain" than about "philosophy of the moral feelings.". I don't know how much of the medical success of Sydenham, and Cooper, and Harvey, and Rush, depended upon the fact that they knew how to pray as well as to prescribe. I don't want a physician who sees no God in human anatomy to doctor my broken bones. If God made us (and I think he did), and if the Bible is true (I am rather disposed to think it is), then it is not strange that prayer does traverse natural cause; aye, that it introduces a new cause. When God made the law He did not make it so strong He could not break it. If God made our bodies, when they are broken He is the one to mend them; and it is reasonable that we should call him to do it. If my furnace in the cellar breaks down, there is no one so competent to repair it as the manufacturer. If my watch stops, there is no one so competent to set it going as one who made it. If the body is disordered, the call in the Maker for it. It is not all, as these physicians tell us, a matter of ventilation or poisoned air, of cleanliness or dirt, of nutritious diet or poor fare. I have known people to get well in rooms where the windows have been six weeks down, tight shut, and I have known them to die right under patent ventilators. I have known children sickly who every day had their bath, and I have known children robust, the washing of whose faces would make their features unrecognizable.

God did not make the law and then run away from it. What is a law of nature? It is only God's usual way of doing things. But he has said that if his children ask him to do a thing and he can consistently do it, he will do it. Go on with your pills and plasters, and nostrums, and elixirs, and your Catholicon, but remember that the mightiest agency in your recovery is prayer. Prayer to God brought the King's cure, the lump of figs being the God-directed human instrumentality.

I would have you also see—for it is another lesson of the subject—that our prayer must also be accompanied by means. It is an outrage to ask God to do a thing while we sit indolent. The prayer, to be acceptable, must come not only from the heart, but from the hands. We must work while we pray, devotion and work going together. Luther came to Welancthon's bedside and prayed for his recovery, and insisted, at the same same time, that he should take some warm soup, the soup being just as important as the prayer. In the time of the great plague that came to York, of England, the priests prayed all night and all day for the removal of the plague, but did not think of clearing out the dead dogs and cats that lay in the gutters, causing the sickness. We must use means as well as supplication. If a man has "evening prayers," asking for health, and then sits down to a full supper of indigestibles at eleven o'clock at night, his prayer is a mockery. A farmer has no right to pray for the safety of his family when he knows there is no cover on his cistern. The Christian man, reckless about his health, ought not to expect the same answer to his prayer as the Christian man expects who retires regularly at ten o'clock at night, and takes his morning bath with the appendix of a Turkish towel. Paul said to the passengers of the Alexandrian corn ship that they should get safe ashore, but he told them they must use means, and that was, "Stick to the old ship!" God is not weak needing our help, but is strong, and asks us to co-operate with him that we may be strong, too. Pray by all means, but don't forget the fig poultice.

That God answers prayers offered in the right spirit, seconded by our own effort, is the first and last lesson of this text, and it is a lesson that this age needs to learn. If all communication between heaven and earth is cut off, let us know it. If all the Christian prayers that are going up toward God never reach him, then, I say, let silence smite the lips of the afflicted world, and the nations smother their groans and die quietly. God does answer prayer. The text shows it. You say: "I don't believe the Bible; I think that those things were merely coincidences, which are often brought as answers to prayer." Do you say that? Was it mere happen-so that Elijah prayed for rain just as the rain was going to come anyhow? Did Daniel pray in the wild beasts' den just at the time when all the lions happened to have lockjaw? Did Jesus pray at the grave of Lazarus just at the time when Lazarus was going to dress himself and come out anyhow? Did Jesus lose His place in His sermon, and make a mistake, when He said: "Ask and it shall be given you; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you"? And, lest some were so stupid they could not understand it, he goes on: "For everyone that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened."

But some one persists in saying: "I don't believe anything of the Bible." Then I appeal to your instincts. Prayer in certain circumstances is as natural to man as the throbbing of the pulse, as the respiration of the lungs. Put a company of men—I don't care how bad they are—in some imminent peril, and they will cry out: "God have mercy on us!" I challenge that these men who don't believe in prayer charter a steamer, go out in the "Narrows," swing out eight or nine hundred miles to sea, and then heave to and wait for a cyclone. And after the cyclone comes and the vessel has gone under ten times, when they did not expect it would rise again, and the bulwarks have been knocked in, and the masts are gone—if they do not pray, I will surrender my theory. Do you tell me that this instinct which God has put in us he put there just to mock us for his own cruel amusement? If God implanted that instinct in the human heart, it was because in His own heart there was something responsible.

To prove that God does hear prayer, I put on the witness stand Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Ezekiel, Jeremiah, Micah, John, Paul, Peter and King Hezekiah. Tell me, ye ancient battle fields, ye oriental threshing floors, ye Judean corn fields, ye Galilean fishing smacks, is God deaf, and dumb, and blind before all human petition? That God answers prayer, I bring the 10,000,000 facts of Christendom to prove. There has never paper enough come out of the paper mills to write the story. Has not many a mother prayed back her bad boy from the ends of the earth—from Canton, from Madras, from Constantinople—until he knelt beside her in the old homestead? Have there not been desperadoes and renegades who have looked into the door of a prayer meeting to laugh and scoff at it, who have been drawn by the power of prayer, until they ran to the altar crying out for mercy? Did not the blacksmith in Lyons, New York, pray to God until there came a great awakening that shook the community.

In my parish in Philadelphia, one night at a meeting, I asked a young man to go into a room at the side of the church and talk upon the theme of religion. He grew violently angry and shook his fists at me. We resolved to pray for that young man, and we prayed that he might yield his soul to God. And when, next night at the meeting, the sidedoor was flung open, he was the first to step in. Prayer had captured him. I had a classmate in college whose uncle, Dr. John Scudder, of India, who wrote to him saying: "I will pray for you every day until such a day, and then I will give my attention to some other subject." The last days of these prayers, when they had all gathered up before the throne of God, my classmate surrendered his soul to Jesus. This is no second hand story. I saw the letter and I knew the young man.

But why should I go so far? I have had in my own experience, and I have had in the history of my own family the evidence that God answers prayer. My mother with three Christian women, assembled week after week and prayed for their children: they kept up that prayer meeting of four persons year after year. The world knows nothing of it. God answered all those prayers. All of the group came in: the 11 sons and daughters of my mother came in, myself the last.

Sickness came to my household—hopeless sickness, as it seemed to many. At 3 o'clock on Saturday afternoon the invalid was carried to the steamer for Savannah. At 11 o'clock, the next day being Sunday, Standing in this very place, a man of God prayed for the recovery of the sick one. At that time, 11 o'clock, she who had been prostrated three weeks, with some help, walked up on deck. This occurrence was as near being miraculous as I can imagine. That she was hopelessly sick, people who sat up with her night after night, and are here, can testify. That the prayer for her recovery was offered in this pulpit, that thousands of people could testify. That at 11 o'clock on that Sunday she walked up on deck, as by a miraculous recovery, I call the passenger on the San Jacinto, commanded by Capt. Atkins, Dec. [illegible], to testify. This is no second-hand story.

Prayer impotent! If I dared to think there was no force in prayer, methinks God after all he has done for me and mine, would strike me dead. Prayer impotent! Why it is the mightest force in the universe. Lightning has no speed, the Alpine avalanche has no power, compared with it.

Will you let the attractions and the vagaries of a few skeptics, stand beside the experience of General Havelock, who came out in front of the English army, lifted his hat, and called upon the Lord Almighty? or of George Washington, who at Valley Forge was found upon his knee in prayer? or of Wilberforce, who went from the British parliament to the closet of devotion? or of Latimer, who stood with his hands on fire, in martyrdom, praying for his persecutors? Was Washington weak? Was Havelock weak? Was Wilberforce weak? Was Latimer weak? Bring all the affairs of your store, of your soul, of your body, of your friends, of your church, before him, and the great day of eternity will show you that the best investments you ever made were your prayers, and though you may have broken promises you made to God, God never broke his promises to you. Let God be true, though every man be found a liar.

And now, in conclusion, I have to present some checks, blank checks, on the bank of heaven, written in blood, and signed by the hand wounded on the cross. It is not safe for you to give a blank check with your name to it. You do not know what might be written above. But here is a blank check which God says I can give you: it is signed by the handwriting of the Lord Jesus Christ, and you can fill it up with anything you want to. "Ask and it shall be given to you; seek, and yet ye shall find." I do not say that your prayer shall be answered in just the way you expect, but I do say it will be answered in the best way. Oh! will you test Him? This is the outcome of all this subject.

If I should ask the men and women in this audience who have found God a prayer-answering God to rise up, you would nearly all rise up. In time of darkness and trouble, as in time of light and prosperity, he answered you. I commend you to that God to whom your parents dedicated you in infancy. They believed so much in prayer that their last word was a supplication for you. Having heard you in days of prosperity, He will not reject your last petition, when in the darkened room, after they had wiped the dew of death from your brow, and the whole group of loved ones have kissed you goodbye, you have only strength enough left to pray: "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit."

Mark Twain's Courtship.

Mark Twain, if he is in the mood, will tell the story of his own courtship in a manner worthy of the greatest of living humorists. When he first met the lady who afterward became his wife he was not so distinguished as now, his origin was humble, and for some years of his life he had been a pilot on the Mississippi River. The future Mrs. Clemens was a woman of position and fortune; her father was a judge and doubtless expected "family" and social importance in his son-in-law, Clemens, however, became interested in his daughter and after awhile proposed, but was rejected.

"Well," she said to the lady, "I didn't much believe you'd have me, but I thought I'd try."

After a while he "tried" again, with the same result, and then remarked with his celebrated drawl, "I think a great deal more of you than if you'd said 'Yes,' but it's hard to bear." A third time he met with better fortune, and then came to the most difficult part of his task, to address the old gentleman.

"Judge," he said to the dignified millionaire, "have you seen anything going on between Miss Lizzie and me?"

"What? What" exclaimed the Judge, rather sharply, apparently not understanding the situation, yet doubtless getting a glimpse of it from the inquiry.

"Have you seen anything going on between Miss Lizzie and me?"

"No, no, indeed!" replied the magnate sternly. "No, no, sir, I have not?"

"Well! look sharp and you will," said the author of "Innocents Abroad;" and that's the way he asked the judicial luminary for his daughter's hand.

Mark has a daughter who inherits some of her father's brightness. She kept a diary at one time, in which she noted the occurrences in the family, and, among them other things, the sayings of her parents. On one page she wrote that father sometimes used stronger words when mother wasn't by and he thought "she didn't hear. Mrs. Clemens found the diary and showed it to her husband, probably thinking the particular page worth his notice. After this Clemens said and did several things that were intended to attrtct the child's attention, and found them duly noted afterward. But one day the following entry occurred.

"I don't think I'll put down anything more about father, for I think he does things to have me notice him, and I believe he reads this diary." She was Mark's own child.

GREAT IS TO-DAY.

Out on a world that's gone to weed,
The great tall corn is still strong in his seed;
Plant her breast with laughter, put song in your toil,
The heart is still young in the mother soil;
There's sunshine and bird song and red and white clover,
And love lives yet, world under and over.

The light's white as ever, sow and believe;
Clearer dew did not glisten round Adam and Eve,
Never bluer heavens nor greener sod
Since the round world rolled from the hand of God;
There's a sun to go down to come up again,
There are new moons to fill when the old moons wane.

European Standing Armies.

A Vienna correspondent throws some light on the large number of men kept in the volunteer military service in Europe. The yearly contingent will be henceforth in Austria in the proportion of 31 out of 10,000 inhabitants. The proportion in Germany is 73, in France 58, in Italy 36 and in Russia 26. The hightest proportion, it will be seen, is in Germany. If the United States were to take such a proportion for military service, its 60,000,000 of inhabitants would keep a standing army of 448,000 men.

The Author's Hardest Task.

Probably the most difficult task in the construction of a story is the management of conversations, so that the individuality of the dramatis personæ may not be hopelessly mixed. The author must keep each character definitely before his mind's eye, so that he may see it as distinctly as he would an intimate friend embodied in the flesh. Virginia G. Ellard.

THE FARM.

Agricultural Notes.

At least two varieties of grain should be given to young stock.

If an animal is worth keeping over winter he is surely worth protecting from the cold. If he is worth any feed at all, he is worth keeping on liberal rations.

Animals to be slaughtered in early winter will lay on two pounds of fat before cold pinches than one pound after that condition comes; besides, when fat, cold will not pinch.

Undoubtedly the badly kept, unventilated stable is the cause of serious diseases in horses. Think of an animal being shut up for twelve hours in a place filled with ammonia and exhausted air.

Make pets of your colts. Make friends of your horses. Treat them kindly and you will not be troubled with unsafe and unruly horses. It is but the humane way to treat them anyway.

It is a good plan to feed some of the bone and muscle forming foods, during the fattening process, whatever the system of swine husbandry may be, says the Western Rural. Some people think that feeding this class of food is wasting it. That is an error. If the food makes muscle it increases the weight and what is more it makes the valuable part of the hog.

There is no doubt that hogs can be fattened quicker and with less food if provided with good warm houses, and the food given in troughs. Use liberally of salt and wood ashes, cinders, refuse coal, slacked lime, brimstone and charcoal about once a week, each in small quantities. Above all things see that your hogs have unfailing appetites and are in good condition physically.—Swine Breeders' Journal.

Get the cow that gives milk all the year round as far as possible. It is a great loss to "dry up" cows when it is not necessary. It takes two-thirds of all the good cow eats to keep her alive and without loss of flesh, and the other third of ordinary good rations to enable her to yield milk. The expense of two-thirds of the money-earning rations has to be incurred when the cow is earning nothing.—Live Stock Indicator.

Dr. S. M. Babcock has shown that there is a clear loss of 2.73 pounds of butter per 100 pounds of cream, through churning the sweet cream before mild acidity was developed. He tried it so many times, say Mr. Hoard, that it may be considered beyond all cavil. But who will be the next stupid man or woman to pour the latest skimming into the churn, the last moment, so as to have all the cream churned, and out of the way?

A correspondent of the Maine Farmer takes great pains to give his cattle all the open air exercise they require throughout the winter on warm sunny days. Sunlight and exercise are two of the greatest factors in promoting health. Shut up human beings in a cotton, oil cloth or shoe factory, month after mouth, carrying them their food and allowing them no exercise at all, and how long before consumption will seize upon them? It is silly to think that cotton seed meal or any other highly concentrated food will originate tuberculosis or pleuro-pneumonia.

A Montana sheep breeder offers to rent ewes at fifty cents a year, the man taking them to have the wool and increase, but bound to return the full number at the end of the specified time. As the sheep are worth perhaps $2.50 each, the capitalist makes twenty per cent, for his money and risk. This seems large, but in the Territories farmers often pay higher rates than this. Two per cent. a month is a frequent price for the use of money there. This is twenty-four per cent. a year, and as it is often compounded several times in twelve months, it amounts to considerably more than this.

To Keep Fresh Meat.

In the Winter season it is often desirable to keep pieces of fresh meat, especially pork, sparerib, etc., as long as possible. Without a refrigerator or ice-house, it may be accomplished very satisfactorily by allowing the meat to freeze hard and then packing tightly in a barrel with snow when it can be obtained, and placing the barrel in a cold place. In this way meat can be kept for months, and so lengthen out the period of home-made fresh meat. Care must be exercised and close watch kept when the snow begins to thaw that the meat does not get uncovered, as it will in a little time become tainted.

The Value of a Pedigree.

The male animal, ram or bull, or male of whatever other class of farm stock, needs improvement, must be himself good, from good parents, and the further back the continuous lines of excellent progenitors stretch the stronger reason we have for confidence that good results will follow his introduction. The lines may so stretch back without a break in the inheritance of excellence, although we may not have the means of blood racing them—in other words, the descent and the blood may be right, yet unrecorded. Our knowledge can not make any difference in the power or lack of power. Still, knowledge of the particulars of descent is worth having. It may prove very useful sometimes. Let us then, by all means, place the true value upon that knowledge, and have the pedigrees of our stock, if possible, and take pains to preserve records of descent for our own information and the information of those who may succeed us. I hold that pedigree, the longer the better, is a thing to be desired, accompaning merit granted. —London Live Stock Journal.

Feathers and Geese.

It is printed that the annual consumption of feathers in this country for bedding purposes is estimated to amount to 3,000,000 pounds. To furnish this 3,000,000 healthy geese must give up their feathers in a year. The geese furnishing these downy pillows and beds of ease are to be found mainly in Southern Illinois, Missouri, Arkansas, Tennessee and Kentucky. The climate is cold enough to cause the feathers to be fine and soft, and not to cold to make their care a matter of unprofitable labor to farmers. Below this territory the feathers are quilly and free from down; above, the cold Winters make geese-farming unprofitable, for when the goose can't find food for herself, because of frozen land and water, she has to be fed, and she'll eat as much corn as a sheep. Speaking of feathers, here is the way to pick dead geese: After killing the goose immerse it in scalding water and then wrap it in a thick cloth for five minutes. All the pin-feathers and down will then come off easily. In marketing geese they may be scalded after all the dry, clean feathers have been removed, but care must be taken not to break the skin. After removing the feathers immerse the carcass in cold water for a hour.

The English Speaking Races.

Of political relations I do not presume to speak. Some may be of opinion that, if the United States hold, as they are likely to hold their political unity a state of such vast dimensions, with wealth in all likelihood more than proportinate, will be menacing, or even perilous to the European world.

I do not share these fears. London, with its 4,000,000 of people, is far better governed, far more under con trol than when it had but one-fourth of its present population. I for one am so sanguine as to believe that, long before it has six or eight millions, it will have acquired and will be in the familiar use of, the estimable privileges of local self government at present wanting to it and will be governed a great deal better still.

Government is, I apprehend, more highly organized now in the United States than when they had one-twentieth or one-tenth of their present population. Happily for mankind, the period of large territorial conquests seems to be drawing rapidly toward a close, and the available surface of the planet is limited so as to forbid an extensive revival.

The internal difficulties of the States, as we hope, have vanished. Their causes of contention with European powers, which were mainly with ourselves, have been, one by one in course of removal, so as to justify the belief that occasions of offense can only be furnished hereafter by a spirit of wanton provocation such as would lie beyond all the ordinary limits of human folly.

I do not understand prospective European difficulties. But they appear to be wholly European, and they do not reach across the broad Atlantic which is, upon the whole, apart from other incidents, a mighty guarantee for peace. There has been no war across the ocean for more than seventy years; why should there be one for seventy, or twice seventy more? It would be presumptuous to say there will not and cannot be an unforeseen controversy; but it need not be presumptuous to hold that there are no British, no European reasons for foreseeing one. Especially if the same true and fine instinct, which taught Americans that the Union must be one from New England to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific, shall also with the lesson of "thus far" teach them as effectually the lesson of "no farther" and help them more and more to realize the enormous advantage of continuous territory.

It is in the same cheerful spirit that I would touch a second political question, with which some British minds may be troubled, Will the uprising nations, which are still dependencies on the British crown, continue for another century to own its supremacy? My answer is simply this: I hope they may; I know of no reason why they should not; why the elastic relations, which now happily subsist, should not continue to find room and verge enough for including and adjusting such novelties as may arise.

It is true that some great war might stir up a new class of difficulties, but I do not despair of finding the resources of civilization to be sufficent for solving them. In the recent history of colonial relations, centripetal has been stronger than centrifugal force; and the vague possibilities of separation have thus far been dwindling and not growing, with the lapse of time.

Even so it is that according to my judgment and experience there is an approximation actually at work, between Englishmen and Americans. They are being drawn nearer and nearer to one another, not by any artificial contrivances, but "with the cords of a man."

Not in proof but in illustration of this sentiment, I may refer to the increasing number of marriages between English and Americans, and the entire genial character of their social result. All my life long I have in a wide and varied circle seen and shared the intercourse of the two countries.

It is not the same as it was. It has been visibly softened, mellowed, ripened. An American stranger is to us more and more like a British stranger, and I hope that a British stranger is more and more like an American stranger. If there is a space between, it is a narrowing space. The great idea of common inheritance, and to a large extent of common prospects, more and more regulates, our relations, and makes easy and familiar the conditions of mutual approach. If not the actual sense, yet something like the actual sense, of a common country, is growing afresh, and the elements of a new moral unity are gradually both multiplied and shaped into familiar use.—E. Gladstone.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Home Notes.

To preserve the elasticity of india rubber, wash it five or six times a year with slightly alkaline water.

Drain pipes and all places that are sour or impure, may be cleansed with lime water or carbolic acid.

The newest fur collars are deep and pointing, forming a V at the back, and coming to a point at the waist-line in front.

In mixing mustard for table use never add vinegar, which destroys its life and flavor. Boil water far moistening it, and let the water become blood warm.

A most exquisite combination costume recently noted was composed of bois de rose satin, black velvet, and light blue moire.

Trimming fur is seldom used about the bottom of fur or cloth coats, but silk and brocade pelisses are sometimes bound all around with fur.

The best way when hot grease has been spilled on the floor is to dash cold water over it, so as to harden it quickly and prevent it striking into the boards.

Oilcloths should never be washed in hot soap-suds; they should first be washed clean with cold water, then rubbed dry with a cloth wet in milk. The same treatment applies to a stone or slate hearth.

Fur lined circulars, we are told by the fashion magazines, will not be chiefly used for evening wraps or for driving. They are too comfortable and convenient a garment ever to be given up entirely.

French walking skirts are two and one-half yards round the bottom, with fitted front and side gores and yoke at the back drawn up on tape, to which the full back breadth is gathered, and have either a hem with trimming put below it, or lace-trimmed flounce set upon the skirt.—Gody's Lady's Book.

It does not follow that sick persons are asleep because their eyes are shut; they may be acutely conscious of all that is passing in the room, though unable or unwilling to make any sign; and nothing can be more nerve-provoking than hushing and whispering around and creaking about on the tip of their toes.

To season glass and china ware to sudden changes of temperature, so that it will remain sound after exposure to sudden heat and cold, is best done by placing the articles in cold water, which must gradually be brought to the boiling point, and then allowing to cool very slowly, taking several hours to do it.

We have heard ladies—educated and intelligent ladies—declare with actual pride their ignorance of the art of cooking. They "could not make a cup of coffee to save their lives," and, as to their making a loaf of bread, or cooking a simple dinner, that was out of their power. Poor, miserable unfortunates!—Western Plowman.

An Ill Turn.

The people at large are too ignorant, too much afraid of pain, too unwilling to deny transient enjoyments or to be governed by hygiene, to pay physicians for wisdom if they tell them they need nothing but cleanliness, exercise and moderation. They turn to the quack, the patent medicine bottle, the paregoric, Jamaica ginger (another name for spiced rum), patent gas, or any one of the thousand ways of trying to escape the penalty of continuing to act as though nature's laws were a friend—Christian Advocate.

Finish What You Begin.

Thousands start well, but never finish one thing at a time. They have a dozen things on hand and no one completed. Time is wasted on unfinished work. Always finish what you begin. One thing finished is worth a hundred half done. The completion of an undertaking yeilds more pleasure and more profit than dozens of plans. The man who is always planning or scheming is rarely, if ever successful. He often furnishes ideas for others who go persistenly to work and finish what his ideas suggested. "That was my idea—my plan," we frequently hear some one say, but the man who carried it out was the one who benfitted himself and others. Do not begin what you cannot finish. What you undertake to do, do, and reap the rewards of your own ideas and skill.—Manufacturer and Builder.

The Popularity of Hash.

"Hash is becoming the popular midday luncheon dish of business men," said a well known restaurant keeper the other day. "One of the reasons for its popularity is the fact that very little time is wasted in chewing it. It seems next to impossible for the average business man to eat slowly. He will waste valuable time talking with acquaintances. He will loiter in his office or in the office of a friend and think nothing of it; but when the luncheon hour arrives he makes a rush for the nearest restaurant and bolts his food with alarming rapidity. A young lawyer will languidly lounge in his office, but when the meal hour arrives a transformation takes place. He rushes to the nearest lunch counter, straddles a stool, and fights with the waiters if not waited on instantly. Hash is what he invariably orders, and it disappears with lightning rapidity. He then returns to the office and yawns and gaps the rest of the afternoon. No wonder dyspepsia holds high carnival in this city. If business men paid more time and attention to their midday meal, they would avoid many a doctor's bill."—New York Sun.

Mismarried.

It is often remarked that first marriages are not the happiest. Such may be true, as the magnetic influence is a necessary element in domestic bliss, whether accompanying first or later partners. There may be repeated weddings sanctioned by law and priestly blessing, but there can be but one marriage. Men and women marry for divers reasons sometimes without considering whether the chosen one fulfills their requirements or otherwise, and consequently remideless disappointments equally as ludicrous as lamentable are the results. Marriage is a voyage where the embarkation is sometimes better than the sail.

The strong-minded females, the men-women, are not the best loved, nor is it the effeminate coxcombs that women dote on. Men like womenly women, and the feminine heart dearly loves that gentle pet restrained power of manly men.

If the first matrimonial venture has been a success woe to to the second edition, even if the fetters are forged in gold, and jeweled with hope. Mammon may be desired, fought for and bought with youth and beauty, but it never fully satisfies and promotes happiness. It is love that gilds the poor man's hovel and makes the palace a home. Sometimes it comes in the flush of youth and lives forever. Again, after several unions it appears later in life as unsullied inpurity as the earlier emotion.

Dante was said to be inconsolable after the death of Beatrice, although his friends gave him another wife, thinking the new passion might cause him to forget the old. Similar is the case of an Eastern divine who lost a much-loved wife some years ago by consumption. While very ill he took her to California, hoping she would regain her health. However, she died, and with almost her last words requested her husband when all was over to take her body back to the East for final burial. The request was granted, and the remains were temporarily buried in California, as the minister was without a church and very poor.

Toward the end of the second year he met a widow of wealth who exhibited her preference for him by decided signs. He proposed to her and they were shortly after married. Immediately going East on a wedding journey—the bride's money to defray expenses.

The clergyman, unknown to his young spouse, had his first wife's remains disinterred and shipped on the same train with themselves. Just before reaching Albany the groom signified his desire to stop over there for a day, to which the bride consented. After he had escorted her to a hotel he vanished and was absent for hours. At night when he returned his face wore a melancholy, doleful expression; and he carried a small parcel under one arm.

"Why, Theoplius, where have you been? exclaimed the bride, "and what have you in this paper?"

"I've been to the cemetery," answered the sad-visaged husband dejectedly.

The bride's face expressed deepest amazement, and with an unexpected movement of her pretty form she relieved the unwilling minister of his package and immediately unfolded the wrappings.

"Mercy!" she ejaculated, as her eyes fell upon a tarnish silver coffin plate. "What is this? Have you been grave-digging?"

"She slowly read the inscription on the plate—"Sacred to the memory of Mary, the only wife, now and through eternity, of Theopolius Parr." "The only wife?" she repeated, with an angry toss of her head. "Id like to know what I am then?"

"The instrument of a Divine Providence," he said, as if in a dream, while his lean fingers trembled nervously. "There can be but one marriage. She is the wife and you are my consort," and he fell into a dejected silence.

Mrs. Theopolius No. 2 thought her husband a trifle insane, but now after years of wedded life she knows better and realizes there are more enviable fates than that of a second wife, especially as every time she places Theopolius' linen in his bureau drawer she comes face to face with that suggestive coffin plate and a pair of small, well-worn slippers, sacred mementos of Mrs. Theopolius No. 1.

The Largest Land-Holder.

Wilson Waddingham, the largest land-holder in the United States, and estimated to be worth $3,000,000, has for his summer residence a fine house with spacious grounds at Savin Rock, just outside of Philadelphia's city line. His house is the finest dwelling in the State, and cost over $500,000. It is occupied by his family and was eight years in construction. Mr. Waddingham made his money in the cattle-raising business, and spends most of his time in visiting his large ranches one of which he recently purchased in New Mexico, consisting of 12,500 acres. He is believed to own over 2,000,000 acres of grazing lands. He has also large investments in profitable real estate in several Western cities.

Millions of Sheep.

The numbers of sheep kept by the principal sheep nations of the world are almost past enumeration. It is computed that in Russia there are at least 50,000,000, in Germany 24,000,000, in France 25,000,000, while Spain has 22,000,000, Hungary 14,000,000, Turkey 16,000,000, and Great Britain, 22,000,000. In Africa the Algerians raise 10,000,000, and Cape Colony produces 11,000,000, Uruguay, in South America, has over 20,000,000, while the Argentine Republic has more than 70,000,000. The number in Australia is estimated at 75,000,000, and in the United States there are at least 40,000,000.

Prof. Huxley has returned to London benefitted, but not completely restored to his health by his journey on the continent.

One of the promised sensations of the Paris exhibition will be given by a man who will make daily baloon ascensions mounted on a horse.

There will be but four farmers in the next Missouri State Senate and one merchant, while the lawyers number twenty-two.

There are fourteen different towns and cities in the United States named Augusta, and there is never a day that freight and mail matter is not going wrong.

The losses of the French people on the Lesseps canal must make them feel somewhat as they did when Bismarck fixed the price of their escape from German authority.

The largest sum ever collected at a charity dinner was $260,000 received at the centenary festival of the Royal Masonic Institute for Girls, recently held at the Albert Hall London.

According to the gossip of the bar the Parnell commission costs precisely three guineas a minute. This calculation includes the whole expenditure of all the parties concerned, the state included.

Misses Dora and Edna Gambel are artists in Los Angeles, Cal., who after spending the past year on their ranch in the Antelope Valley have opened a studio in the city, and show among other mountain studies more than a hundred different varities of wild flowers.

Labrador is said to possess a waterfall that makes Niagara Falls insignificant in comparison. R. F. Holm, who recently made a tour of Labrador, locates this fall on the Grand river, which is 1,500 feet wide at the fall, and the height of the fall is estimated to be nearly 2,000 feet.

Four Brothers married to four sisters by the same minister was the record finished at Louisville, Ky., on the 21st when George Rothemberger was married to Louisa Wieglieb. The parties are all German Lutherans, and the two families represented have been neighbors for thirty years on farms about ten miles from the city.

Two young men operating under the names of Hughes & Taylor have swindled farmers and others in the southern counties of New York State out of $15,000 and left for parts unknown. They represented themselves as commission merchants, and thus succeeded in having consignments of farm produce forwarded to them. They pocketed the proceeds and decamped.

At a family dinner given not long ago by Valentine Winter, a venerable banker of Dayton, Ohio, under the plates were found envelopes containing deeds, stocks, bonds, etc., aggregating nearly $500,000, as presents to his children and grand-children. In like manner he divided $400,000 between them in 1882, and it is not an uncommon thing for his children to find $1,000 checks under their plates.

The editor of a territorial weekly received a number of letters from his subscribers urging him to publish his paper bi-weekly. He did so, but when they found that this meant only once in every too weeks they looked in their dictionaries and decided that a semi-weekly was what they wanted, It is an interesting fact that while "bi-weekly" means once in two weeks, "tri-weekly" means three times a week.

One September evening in Mittineague, a village two miles west of Springfield, Mass., the good people gathered to the Congregational Church vestry for regular prayer meeting service. The young minister, recently ordained, has been appointed to lead the services, but though the congregation waited he failed to appear. Finally concern at his non appearance caused a message to be sent to his house, and the messenger returned with the answer that the dominie was ill and could not lead on that occasion. It finally transpired that the clergyman had started faithfully for the meeting that evening, but on the way had committed the time-honored error of attempting to pet a strange cat, which quickly proved its innocence of domestic felicity, and while his flock sang "Sweet By and By" he was engaged in the unpleasant interment by lantern light of a gladly relinquished suit of clothes.

THE NEWS RESUME.

The Cream of the News Gleaned From the Latest Associated Press Telegrams.

The Casualty Calendar:

W. J. Borrer, aged twenty-two, while engaged in his father's sawmill at Rock Chapel, Ontario, slipped and fell on a large circular saw, and his body was cut almost in two, causing death a few hours later.

A search for Gus Smith, a boy who had been missing since Christmas, was rewarded at Eau Claire, Wis., in finding the body under the ice in the river with a cut on the forehead. An inquest was held and the jury decided it a case of accidental drowning.

A small grocery store on South State street in Chicago was destroyed by an incendiary fire one morning, and an unknown man, supposed to have been a burglar, was burned to death. A barrel of oil in the front part of the store exploded during the fire, and a man named Frank Pollo, who was standing outside the door, was fatally burned.

The entire business portion of Auburn, a small town seven miles north of Grafton, Dakota, was destroyed by fire. The fire was started in the Arlington house, owned by William MacKenzie, and burned eleven buildings. The losses will fully aggregate $40,000; insurance, $20,000. Four families are homeless. The fire was of incendiary origin.

Amelie Thurin, seventeen years of age, who was employed as a domestic in a private family, upon retiring at Chicago blew out the gas and was found dead in bed next morning. The girl came from Sweden three weeks ago and had been at work for the family only five days. Three nights in succession her employer had turned out the gas in the girl's room to show her how it was done, but she failed to learn.

Two freights on the Rock Island, running twenty miles an hour, colided in a deep cut near Tiptop Colorado, completely demolishing both engines and trains and instantly killing Fireman Harding and crushing the skull and otherwise injuring engineer Hoge. Engineer Case received severe injuries on the head. Fireman Houtz suffered a fractured hip, injured shoulder and severe wounds on the head, which may prove fatal. The other train hands were only slightly bruised.

An accident occurred at Denver which resulted in the instant death of at least four men and mortally wounding of two others. The Denver Gas company had 100 men employed in excavating a ditch, six feet deep along the side of and underneath the track of the cable car line, when suddenly the track for an entire block fell, crushing the life out of and imprisoning the men underneath. The men were immediately set to work removing the fallen track and four dead and two badly wounded have been removed. The other men escaped with more or less bruises. It is not yet known whether any more are underneath the track or not. The names of the dead and wounded have not been ascertained.

Talk About People.

The fact that Congressman Moffat of Pennsylvania is confined in a private asylum, the result of over work and excitement incident to the recent campaign, has called attention to the fact that over half a dozen congressman who were defeated for either renomination or re-election have thus far this season not appeared in the house. In several instances, they are reported as suffering from melancholia incident to their defeat.

Petty Criminalities.

W. H. Webb, who murdered his wife at Brandon on Sept. 1 was hanged at Winnipeg. He met his doom without flinching, and professed to have received religion. Death was instantaneous.

On a farm near North Loup, Nebraska, Sheriff Nicholl arrested a man answering the description of the supposed murderer of Miss Mehitable White of Concord, Mass. A large reward had been offered for him. He denies his guilt.

Prado, the murderer of Marie Aigutant, his mistress, was guillotined at Paris in the Place de la Roquette. He perserved a firm pemeanor to the last. He refused to make a confession, and also declined the services of the chaplain. The death was witnessed by some 200 artists, newspaper men, lawyers and politicians, who possessed influence sufficent to obtain admission within the sentry lines to the Place de la Roquette. He died with much the same bravado as Pranzini, his former chum and counterpart.

A gambler named Jack Galvin got into a dispute with another man in Helena, Mont. Jack Harris, a well known gambler and athlete, interferred and took the stranger's part, when another quarrel ensued between Galvin and Harris, the latter knocking the former down. Galvin secured a dagger and followed Harris to Dell Dick's saloon to fight Harris. A scuffle followed, both men falling to the floor, when Galvin pulled his dirk and stabbed Harris in the left side, the blade cutting through a rib. The wounded man now lives at the hospital in a critical condition. Galvin is in jail. Sympathy seems to be with Galvin, as Harris is regarded as a bully, and shot a man at Great Falls last year.

In front of the guillotine a board stood upright to a height of five feet. Four burley men dressed in blouses of blue and white, striped stockings, sprang forward, seized the condemned man, hurled him onward against the upright, flung themselves upon him, and by their weight bore the struggling victim, face downward, to the top of the low platform. That board worked on a swivel and ran on rollers. In an instant it had been wheeled forward until the neck was under the glistening knife, upon which the morning light had begun to gleam. Then the knife was sprung, and the keen steel struck the neck as it might have collided with a rubber car spring. It went through, and the head of Prado lay among the shavings beyond.

One of the boldest robberies ever committed in St. Louis, occurred on Olive street, near Sixth, the busiest part of the city. Henry Ashoff, with Rosenheim, Lewis & Co., wholesale millinery, had drawn $1,300 from the Bank of Commerce. He had the money in three packages—one of $1,000 and two of $150 each. At George Neil's hat store, 625 Olive street, he was jostled by three well-dressed men and found $300 of his money missing. He gave the alarm and one man was arrested. The prisoner gave the name of C. W. Ward, but afterward admitted his name was Clifford W. Ely, and stated that he traveled for Price, the collar and cuff dealer, Chicago. The money was not found on the prisoner.

James Green, of Wolcott, Wayne county, N. Y., who cut his wife's throat after hitting her on the head with a hammer, and then cut a frightful gash in his own neck, succeeded in escaping from his watchers and getting possession of a razor, inflicted another deep cut on the opposite side of his neck from the first, and died in a few moments. He had made frequent attempts during the day to tear open the first wound, but was held on the bed by two attendants. Mrs. Green will probably die. When asked why he attempted to kill his wife, Green would only reply: "Because I wanted to." Green's son, a young man, says his father was jealous without cause, and that women gossips are to blame for the trouble. There is great excitement in the village over the tragedy.

Judge Robert A. Johnston committed suicide at his residence in Avondale near Cincinnati. About two months ago, his estimable wife, daughter of the late Judge Ewing, died after a long and painful illness. Since then, Judge Johnston has been known to be broken with grief, though he has attended nearly as usual to his duties. He resided with his married daughter, Mrs. Harries Hurlbert, and after dinner visited the grave of his wife at Spring Grove cemetery. In the morning, he rose, and, without dressing himself, took a revolver which he had in his room, and deliberately fired a ball through his head, causing instantaneous death. He was well-established financially, happy in all his domestic relations and has no known cause for this act, except for his overwhelming grief at the loss of his lifelong companion. He was between 55 and 60 years old.

An unknown man entered the saloon of C. Kalmbach, in the suburbs of Omaha, as he was closing up, and, flashing a revolver in his face, ordered him to throw up his hands. Kalmbach seized the man, when the latter fired, the ball striking Kalmbach just above the temple. The saloon keeper threw his assailant to the floor when a second man rushed in and began beating Kalmbach over the head with a revolver. The saloonkeeper's dog here seized the second man, and Kalmbach succeeded in throwing the first man out of the window. The second burglar then broke away from the dog and fled. Kalmbach staggered to the house of a neighbor. The bullet was found about an eighth of an inch from the temple and a half inch from the point where it entered. There were 14 bad scalp wounds. His recovery is considered doubtful. The assailants are still at large.

At a country church in Coffey county, Georgia, a few days since, a man who was disturbing public workship was killed by the preacher in charge of the church. For some time trouble has existed in the church, one faction favoring the retention of the present pastor, and the other favoring his dismissal. The faction fight grew very bitter, and the trouble reached a climax recently, when the pastor's friends voted him for another year. One of the members most bitterly opposed to the pastor, approached the pulpit where the reverend gentleman was sitting, and engaged in conversation with him. This became much excited, and finally the member raised his hand and dealt the preacher a sharp blow on the cheek. The pastor remonstrated with his assailant, but he struck the preacher again and again, accompanying the blows with a profusion of vile epithets, and also spitting in the minister's face. The minister drew his knife and stabbed his assailant repeatedly. Women screamed, and the men looked on aghast, while the unfortunate man fell down in the pulpit and died.

Foreign Gleanings

It is rumored that the Czar is disposed to become reconciled to Prince Alexander of Battenberg, late Prince of Bulgaria, and the report is construed that Russia will advocate his resumption of the Bulgarian throne.

Brussels, in Belgium, has been thrown into a ferment of excitement by the reception by prominent people of cards and telegrams announcing the advent in the quaint old city of the famous "Jack the Ripper," of Whitechapel notoriety. King Leopold, the perfect of police and the court ministers are among the recipients of this mysterious being's delicate attention.

The steamer Leo went into Prince Frederick sound Alaska, and anchored, and when the tide receded and the storm abated the Leo was left high and dry on the the ledge of Table Rock. The vessel settled down ten feet, striking her stern on rocky boulders, completely demolishing the keel. The tide fell twenty-four feet. The crew landed on the beach half a mile distant and saved all the vessels gear, while the cargo was lost. A boat with five men was sent to Juneau for assistance, and the rest of the crew remained on the beach for twenty-two days. Capt. Whitford and the cook remained at the scene of the disaster, guarding what material was saved until the same can be taken to Sitka.

Other News Jottings.

The ducking tub and hanging by the wrists, modes of punishment long in vogue at the Ohio penitentiary, have been abolished by Warden Coffin as too severe and inhuman, and the dark dungeon will be substituted for them.

A section of iron pipe, 6 inches long and 2½ inches in diameter, containing three heavy dynamite catridges, and with a fuse attached, was found under a stairway on the tenement 311 East Thirty-eighth street, New York The police is trying to find out who placed it there.

Another $25,000 libel suit against the Chicago Times, growing out of its recent infanticide investigations, was begun in the circuit court by Dr. Walter F. Knoll. The alleged libelous article printed under a heading which announced that the doctor was a physician who would perform a criminal operation "out of sympathy." Dr. Knoll claims that the interview with him did not bear out the allegations of the headline, but that he was mis-represented most grossly.

The work on the Panama canal continues, although on some sections labor has been reduced. Altogether some 2,000 men have been discharged during the past two months, owing to disputes between the canal company and contractors. It is not expected that any more workmen will be dispensed with. The highest authorities consider a total suspension of work as very improbable. Such a suspension could only be occasioned by the complete failure of the reorganization scheme now under consideration in Paris. There are now about 9,000 laborers actually engaged on the works. There is no foundation for the reports recently circulated that 75 percent of the men now in the employ of the company would be discharged at end of one year.

The legislature of Idaho Territory, now in session, is considering measures looking to the overthrow of the influence of the Mormon church in territorial politics. The present election law requires voters when casting their ballots to take oath that they are not members of the Mormon church. The object of this law was evaded at the late election by Mormons permitting themselves to be excommunicated from the church with the understanding that they would be reinstated after the election. It is now proposed to pass a law requiring each voter to make affidavit that he has not been a member of the Mormon church within two years preceding the election.

There was a sad sequel at Chicago to a case resembling that of lost Charlie Ross. The missing child in this instance was little Tessie Redmond, the pretty golden-haired four-year-old daughter of sturdy looking John Redmond, a blacksmith. The father, driven crazy by the worry and anxiety of his little one's disappearance and his fruitless effort to recover her, was at last adjudged insane in the county court and committed to a private asylum. May 22, last, Tessie was playing in front of her father's house on State Street. That was the last ever seen of her. Her disappearance was as complete as it was mysterious. Rewards were offered, but all that the strictest inquiry ever revealed was the testimony of some playmates who said that they saw a woman in black approach Tessie and proffer her sweetmeats. When they turned around again the mysterious woman and her supposed victim had gone.

A serious riot occurred near Tripp, Dak., between Russian Mennonites and Americans. A public sale was made at the farm of a Russian man named Siuk, and a farmer named Merchant purchased a dozen chickens. He tied them in pairs and put them in a wagon and when ready to go home found that two had been stolen. He complained to Siuk, who told him to take something else of equal value. He caught a goose and started home, but was soon overtaken by a party of eight, Russians, who claimed the goose as their property. A wrangle ensued that attracted others to the scene and soon a general fight began, in which about twenty men were engaged, with the Russians as the aggressors. Two brothers named Johnson, who were passing, came to the assistance of the Americans, who were outnumbered two to one, and drawing knives the Johnson boys rushed among the Russians, but found the force too strong. A Russian named Mayer was stabbed, and he in turn split Charles Johnson's head open with a neck yoke, inflicting a fatal injury. George Johnson had his right arm broken above the elbow by a blow from the neck yoke, and three Russians were out, but none fatally. When the Americans found that the crowd was too big for them they withdrew, and the Russians were taken care of by friends, and because of their clannish customs no particulars are obtainable from them. The affair created intense excitement in the vicinity, where the majority of the settlers are Russians, who live in abject poverty, and have as little as possible to do with Americans.

Trouble of Saloon Keepers.

In the district court at Grand Forks D. T. Judge Templeton gave the liquormen a very black eye when he decided that a saloonkeeper could not claim the protection of the law until his license was issued, even though he had filed bonds and paid the license money. This affects a number of cases. The county commissioners, after the local option law was passed, granted license for the balance of the year at $125. Quite a number of saloon men paid their money to the treasurer and filed bonds, commencing to sell liquor at once and before the bonds had been acted upon by the commissioners. Indictments were found against some on this ground and they have put up money in the shape of fines. John Sanden, of McKinock, was found guilty of selling liquor to minors. He plead guilty to the second charge of the same character and to a third charge of unlawful selling. The court imposed a fine of $150 on charge or to go to jail and work out the fine at the rate of $2 per day. Judgement was reserved on the other counts. Sanden went to jail. James Rich, of Manuel, was found guilty of unlawfully selling liquor during local option times and was sentenced to jail for fifteen days without the option of a fine. George Swenson, who refused to heed a subpœna to appear before the grand jury, was sent to jail for seven days for contempt of the court.

Horrible Steamboat Disaster.

The elegant passenger steamer Kate Adams, running as a semi-weekly packet between Memphis and Arkansas City, was burned near Commerce, Miss., forty miles below Memphis. She was en route to Memphis, and had about two hundred people aboard, including her deck and cabin crew of 80, and 25 cabin and 60 deck passengers, and 25 colored cabin passengers. The fire, which caught in some cotton near the forward end of the boilers, was discovered about 8 o'clock. The passengers were at breakfast and when the alarm was given they all made a rush for the forward deck. At the time the steamer was about three hundred yards from the Mississippi side of the river, and her bow was at once headed for the shore. Pilot Joe Barton was on watch, and he remained heroically at his post until she was safely landed. Harry Best, the second clerk, who was seated at the table when the alarm was given, had brought all the ladies and children forward and assisted them ashore. Capt. Mark R. Cheek, who was on the hurricane deck, remained there, giving his commands until the stage plank was safely lowered. The fire by this time had spread all through the cabin, and he was compelled to retreat to the rear, and climbed over the rails and descended to the cabin. Here he found Chief Clerk W. C. Blanker, who had make an effort to save the money and papers of the steamer, which were in the safe. He managed to grab the money, but was cut off from the bow and forced back into the cabin. As he was groping his way aft he stumbled and fell over some chairs and lost all the valuables he had secured, and it was with great difficulty that he succeeded in reaching the rear through the blinding smoke and flames which filled the cabin. Capt. Cheek seized a life preserver, and placing it on Chief Clerk Blanker, helped him overboard into the water. He floated down about three miles before he was rescued by parties who had followed him down the river. Capt. Cheek assisted several others in securing life preservers, and when it was no longer possible for him to remain without being burned he, too, jumped into the river and swam ashore. There were about twenty-five colored cabin passengers, who were saved along with the white passengers. On the lower desk, however, a fearful panic seized the crew and deck passengers. Those who were cut off from escape from the bow were compelled to jump overboard to save their lives. The stern of the burning steamer had swung out into the river, and an effort was made to launch the yawl, but it was capsized by the crowd which filled it and many of its occupants drowned. They were mostly colored men, but there were three or four women in the crowd.

In addition about fifteen deck passengers, four of whom were white men, were also drowned. In the list of unknown were three colored women and two children. They were coming to Memphis to spend the holidays. The whites had been working on the levees and their names and destination are unknow. Three of the colored cabin crew who were rescued from the water died afterwards.

Mrs. Harry Field, one of the lady passengers, was seated at the breakfast table when the cry of fire was heard. She paid little attention to it at first, but when she saw smoke filling the cabin she ran to the bow of the steamer which by this time had touched the bank, and tried to jump ashore. She failed and fell to the lower deck. A negro man, who was close behind her, followed her example, and like her failed to reach the shore, but fell near her. The fire was scorching hot where they were, but the negro gathered her in his arms and carried her to the bank, and thus saved her from being burned to death, as she was unable to move after having fallen from the boiler deck. Mrs. Fields is positive that W. A. Covington, a planter and merchant of Rosedale, Miss., perished in the flames. She thinks he must have been suffocated in his stateroom, as he was aboard and nothing has been seen or heard of him since the disaster. Billy Hodges, one of the pilots, was in the barber shop getting shaved when the alarm was sounded. He rushed to the stern of the boat and providing himself with a life preserver, jumped overboard. While swimming to the shore he found Sam Robinson, a passenger, struggling in the water, and assisted him to the shore. It is reported that a negro murderer who was being brought back for trial, perished on board the steamer. He was handcuffed, and the officer in charge made his escape and left the negro in his helpless condition, and he was burned to death. It is impossible to definitely ascertain how many lives were really lost, but a conservative estimate places the number at not less then thirty-eight. It may probably reach fifty'

Feeding Canadian Indians.

The denial from the Canadian authorities that Canadian half-breeds have made or intended to make a raid upon the Turtle mountain reservation is without weight or importance from the fact that the raid mentioned had been going on for years and has resulted in transferring from the Canadian territory to become a burden upon the United States nearly 4,000 half-breeds, all of them sufficiently civilized to earn a living for themselves and their families. The half-breeds' raid began soon after the Reil rebellion, when a few of Reil's followers crossed the border to avoid the responsibility of having taken their guns and defended their homes when the valiant Gen. Middleton raided them. They left their farms and attached themselves to the Turtle Mountain agency. Our government protected them at first out of motives of humanity, and has ever since borne the burden without a murmur. Indolence is not entirely incidental to a Southern latitude, and to lie around and be fed was better than trying to earn a living out of a Manitoba farm, however excellent a wheat country. Those there sent back word to their friends and neighbors, and the "raid" has continued up to this time. In making up his memoranda for his annual report Chief Bell of the Indian division of the secretary's office, drew attention to the urgent necessity for some legislation for the relief of the Turtle Mountain Chippewas. In the report he says:

Since 1863, when they were reported as Little Chief's band of twenty-seven Indians, with 442 mixed blood followers, their numbers have been increased, according to the report of the agent for 1888, to 346 full bloods with a following of 1,020 mixed bloods. But recent communications from persons in the locality who are interesting themselves in behalf of these people report that the number now on the reservation is about 3,700 persons, with enough belonging thereon, now absent hunting, to swell the total to about 5,200. There can be no question that the great increase of the number of these people is due to large accessions of their relations and friends from the British possessions, who go there to share in the very limited food supplies furnished for the Indians on the reservation.

A Fargo Man Missing.

The family and friends of Charles T. Clement of Fargo, D. T., are in a state of painful suspense and anxiety to know his whereabouts. He left home for Chicago on business, Thursday, Dec. 6, and two days later arrived in Chicago where he registered at the Saratoga house. Nothing direct has been been heard from him since. A. S. Bates went to Chicago a few days ago, at the request of the Grand Army post of which he and Mr. Clements are members, but was unable to obtain any satisfactory information whatever. Col. Bates returned and reports that all he could learn was that Mr. Clement paid his bill at the Saratoga house on Monday, Dec. 10; that on the same day he lunched with C. D. Whitehouse, a former resident of Fargo and that he informed Mr. Whitehouse that he would leave for home that night. He was then apparently in his natural health and as cheerful as usual. Since that time no trace of him has been found and his friends fear the worst. He had about settled up his business matters here and it was understood that he contemplated removing to Knoxville, Tenn., some time in January. He had a number of acquaintances there, but neither they nor his relatives at Lafayette, Ind., his former home, have seen or heard of him. Various theories have been advanced to account for his very strange disappearance and silence, but they are mere conjectures. He was a prominent and highly esteemed citizen, having resided at Fargo eight years and during that time occupied positions of honor and responsibility. For four or five years he was president of the board of education, at one time commander of the Grand Army post and an aide on the commander-in-chief's staff, and for a year or more was secretary of the board of trade. He has always been highly respected and has a most estimable family. Mrs. Clement is ill and nearly distracted with suspense and anxiety.

MINNESOTA IN BRIEF.

A pork packing establishment is talked of at Albert Lea.

The Faribault Electric Light and Power company, with a capital of $50,000, has been incorporated.

A son of John McMichael had his skull fratured while coasting at Owatonna.

Red Wing people will not witness any dramatic entertainments this winter. The opera-house manager says that the house will remain closed unless the council grants a free license, and it has refused to do so.

John Fultare, who has been confined in the insane asylum at Rochester for some time past, escaped and reached St. Cloud his former home. He was immediately placed under arrest and will be returned to Rochester.

A marriage license was issued at Chicago to Mrs. Eliza Berdelman, aged seventy-two, of West Concord, Minn. The prospective groom is Rev. John Marshall, sixty-seven years of age. He is a Presbyterian minister of Knoxville, Tenn.

Philip Sheridan Sullivan, convicted at the November term of one year at hard labor in the state prison, has been pardoned by Gov. McGill. This is somewhat of a surprise to the people of Washburn county and particularly to the residents of Mazeppa, the scene of Sullivan's late adventures.

Johannes Peterson, a farmer fifty-eight years of age, living in Vasa, was found dead near Featherstone, his body lying under the contents of his wagon. It is believed that he was crushed to death through his wagon upsetting.

The mayor of Brainerd has issued an order stopping all gambling in the city. The mandate has fallen like a wet blanket on the professionals, as they have been allowed full sway during the last six months, and the city has been overrun with men of that class.

After being out thirty-six hours, the jury in the Erickson murder trial at Buffalo brought in a verdict of guilty of assault in the third degree. The indictment was brought for murder in the third degree. Judge Rea fined the defendant $100, which he paid.

Senator G. W. Wood while driving at Faribault was thrown from his buggy, and quite seriously injured. At first he thought his leg was broken, but upon examination it is said to be a bad sprain of the knee. It is thought the only injury of a serious nature which he received was the knee.

Mrs. Caroline Peck, one of the first settlers in Goodhue county, aged seventy-four years, died. She was married fifty years ago last November to Julius Peck, who at the age of eighty-one survives her. She gave two sons to her country, one of whom died at Gettysburg, and the other at New Ulm.

James Stewart, engineer on the Milaca branch of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba railroad, was run over and instantly killed by an eastbound Northern Pacific passenger train. He had boarded the train to see a friend off, and fell beneath the cars in attempting to alight. He was unmarried. His family lives at St. Cloud. He was one of the most popular railroad men in St. Cloud, and leaves a mother and aunt, whose sole support he was. His body was taken to St. Cloud, and was met by a committee of his fellow employes.

Howard L., the thirteen-year-old son of H. L. McKinstry, M. D. died at Zumbrota. A few days ago he swallowed a screw one inch in length, but, as none of the symptoms that attend the lodgment of a foreign substance in the windpipe or bronchial tubes followed, it was thought that it had passed into the stomach. But the next day inflamation of the lungs set in. A council of physicians decided that an operation to remove the screw was advisable, and it was performed, but was not successful. After death the screw was taken from the right lung.

When the men employed on Fish's railroad contract left camp before Christmas, the cook, George L. Stafford, remained in charge. On their return at night they found Stafford in a sitting posture outside of the camp bereft of life, he having died during the day from excessive drinking. He was about thirty-five years of age and a jeweler by trade. It is believed he lived at Hamline. The coroner made an investigation, but decided that no inquest was necessary. He found two watches, $50 in money and a trunk belonging to the deceased, who will be buried at Zumbrota.

At Carleton college observatory regular work in astronomical photography is now being done. Pictures taken in the focus of the 8¼ inch Clark equatorial telescope enlarge to a diameter of five inches, showing, in the case of the moon, good definition and a great variety of detail. Spots, faculæ and even the best pictures of the sun, which are also five inches in diameter. An accurate measure of the time of exposure to the sun of the sensitive plate will soon be made by a novel method which has been employed elsewhere with success in measuring fractional parts of a second as a hundredth part.

Brig-Gen. D. S. Stanley, commanding the department of Texas, announcing that he was placed under arrest by the local legal authorities of Austin, Texas., for having attempted to eject J. M. Snyder from government property that had been donated to the school board of Austin for the erection of a school house. Capt. Rambaugh, Gen. Stanley's aide, was also arrested. They were committed to jail by Justice Stuart in default of $250 bonds, which they refused to give, but the sheriff would not receive them from the constable and they were released.

THE FAIRY CUPBOARD.

BY JULIA CLARK-CHASE.

In the school yard at Westbury stood a big maple tree, green and thrifty with a square hole in the trunk, about three feet from the ground, and about two feet deep. Of course it was dark as night inside, and it was hollowed out of the body of the tree to the size of half a bushel.

The children had a superstitious awe of the dark hole in the tree and various stories were told of it. No one knew how the hole was made, or how long it had been there, but it was called the "Fairy Cubboard."

The school house was built a quarter of a mile away from the village, in a beautiful maple grove, and the nearest house was that of Mr. Stanley the only druggist of the place. He had three children a baby 2 years old and twins of 9—Nell, a girl and Dell, a boy.

Now their names were so much alike that it might have caused some trouble, only for the reason that the twins were always together. They never could bear to be apart for a moment, and their parents had simply to shut them up in separate rooms, for any misconduct and they were sufficiently punished. But I am happy to say that they did not often need to be parted.

It was the vacation between the summer and winter school terms and the children had plenty of time for play; but they could not romp or shout or make a noise about the house, for their papa had been very ill for several weeks, and was only just out of danger, the doctor said, and it would be a long, long time before he would be able to go back to the drug store again.

Their mother was in close attendance upon him, so the children had to depend upon themselves for amusement. They were very sad, too, sometimes, for if their dear father should die they felt that they could never be happy any more. He had always been so kind to them, and they were so comfortable in their pretty home, but with sickness, and trouble and expense and death so near, the sorrow and worry had entered their young hearts and shadowed their young lives. We are always so careless of the blessings that fill our lives untill they are hidden from us, that sorrow and trouble are very good things, once in a while, to teach us to appreciate our everyday happiness.

The children were wandering about the wood, one day, picking up the first bright leaves that had fallen to the ground at the touch of Autumn's fingers, when Dell said: "Oh dear, I wish we could do something we have never done before—something that would make us forget about papa."

Nell looked up with honest surprise in her big brown eyes: "I don't want to forget about papa."

"Well, I mean forget about his being sick and having to suffer so," said the boy.

"I think we ought to feel just as badly as we can, and not let mamma have it all to do," insisted Nell.

She rarely differed with Dell, but the sight of her dear mother's tears and pale, tired face made a great impression upon her tender heart.

"Well, I wish there were real fairies, and I would get a fairy god mother to come and nurse papa, and make him well, and then mamma could rest."

"Let's go to the Fairy Cupboard," said his sister, "maybe we can find something there."

So off they went hand in hand, and peered into its sable depths with solemn, wistful faces.

"If there were faries we couldn't see them by daylight, they only come out at night."

Nell put her hand cautionsly into the hole and drew it back exclaiming, "There might be something in there to bite me."

Dell laughed, and with a boy's bravado thrust his arm into the tree only to draw out with a startled scream.

"What is it, Dell?"

"I don't know; something with fur and it moved!"

"Oh, Dell, it's a squirrel!"

"May be 'tis let's see;" and he put his hand in, very cautiously this time, soon to be followed by the other, and then he brought out, not a squirrel, but a young rabbit.

The children were delighted with their prize, and laughed and shouted until they frightened the poor timid thing nearly to death. They took it home and made a house for it of an old birdcage.

After they had provided it with food and water, they went into the house, remembering for the first time in half an hour that they had both actually forgotten their poor sick father. Nell was remorseful at the thought of it; but her brother declared that the faries had put the rabbit there for them, intending them to have something pleasant to think about.

"And mamma told us to enjoy ourselves and not worry about papa, or we would get sick, too, don't you remember, Nell?"

It seemed so dreary in the house at twilight with no mother in the sitting room holding Bennie in her arms all ready to tell them a story as was her wont before sickness had entered the home.

The girls had supper waiting in the dining room, but the children waited till Mrs. Stanley came out to eat a few hasty mouthfuls, before they went to the table; then they told her about the rabbit.

"Well, dears, I am glad you have something pleasant to think of; but don't let the poor thing suffer in captivity."

They talked about it until they went to sleep that night and wondered if they had not better let the little creature go back to the wood; then they wondered if it would find its mother.

Bright and early Nell was up and dressed, and ran in to Dell's room where he and Bennie were still sleeping; but the former was soon ready to accompany his sister to the house where they had left bunny the night before. What was their surprise to find the cage empty, though everything was just as they had left it the night before.

"Where can he be! Let's go to the wood and see if he is there."

And off they ran while puss sat meekly washing her face after her breakfast of young rabbit.

They didn't find their pet, but they found quite a quantity of walnuts.

"Let's leave them here and come every day and get a few," said Dell.

So they each took a handful and after eating them they went to look for red moss cups in the wood.

The next morning found them again at their store-house with glad voices and happy hearts, for their father was a great deal better, and their mother looked happier than she had done for a long time.

"Let me get the nuts out this time; I'm not afraid any more, and I want to see what the fairies have put in for us this time," said Nell.

"It was the squirrels that put the nuts there," answered Dell, "but we can call it faries, it seems so mysterious."

As the boy pronounced this big word they reached the tree and the little girl thrust in her hand and drew a handsome gold watch with a heavy chain attached to it,

They looked at each other in consternation, and thought the fairies must really have something to do with the wonderful cupboard.

After handling the watch and looking it over, almost expecting it to vanish, Dell put his hand in and drew forth some silver spoons of different sizes, and table forks all mixed up in the dead leaves, nuts and pieces of bark in the dark heart of the tree. He saw something glitter and found it to be a couple of large diamond rings. Then he took out a case with a necklace of pearls and diamonds in it.

"We can't carry all those things; let's go and tell mother and get Bennie's wagon to take them in," said Dell.

They ran all the way home and knocked at the door of their mother's room, out of breath, thinking the grand discovery of sufficent importance to warrant their coming to their mother, now that their father was so much better.

Mrs. Stanley was astonished at what the children told her, and sent them to ask the doctor to come to the house, as she wanted to see him. When he heard the story he said that a burglary had been committed in the city, ten miles away, and that a reward of $1,000 had been offered for the stolen goods, as the silver was valued as being a family heirloom. Another $500 had been offered by the police for the robber.

"Don't let any one know these things have been found, and we may catch the burglar, too. You were very sensible, Mrs. Stanley, to send for me. I will secretly inform the constable; we will take possession of the plunder and then watch for the thief to-night."

Everything was managed so quietly and quickly that the unsuspicious thief was taken when he come to look at the contents of the Fairy Cupboard and lodged in jail in the city next day.

The Stanleys received the $1,000, and the doctor the $500 which he divided with the constable.

Mrs. Stanley told the children she had been wondering where the money to pay the doctor bill and the drug clerk from the city was coming from, but that she never dreamed they would earn it for her.

The family in town which had been robbed were very glad to get back their possessions, for many more things were found in the hollow tree and they as well as the children had cause to bless the Fairies' Cupboard. —Wisconsin.

A Story About Nilsson.

When Christine Nilsson first appeared in public twenty or more years ago, she was a bony and freckled Scandinavian lass, like scores one sees in Western towns. Now she is a magnificent woman, commanding in carriage and countenance. Occasionally her temper gets the better of her on the stage and once, here in Chicago, she knocked over the piano stool and stamped angrily because something had gone wrong. If she proved herself ungrateful to former benefactors, retribution came quickly in the treatment which she met at the hands of her first husband's relations, upon whom she had lavished princely donations.

She is a woman of noble impulse, which was once illustrated at the house of a retired Chicago millionaire near New York. A distinguished company had been invited to meet her at dinner. On entering the dining-room she dropped her host's arm, hurrying in amazement to the stately young butler, and seizing him effusively by the hand, engaged him in conversation, while the other guests stood waiting and the entertainer looked on in astonishment. "That man," she explained to the group, when they were seated, "is the son of a kind old nobleman on whose estate my father worked as a day laborer when we were children. Fortune has smiled on me, while it has frowned on my old playmate, whom I find here wonder such changed circumstances." —America.

"Say, father," said the Editor's son "is there anything in the world that never gets lost?" "There is only one thing that I know of," solemnly and sadly replied the weary father, as he continued his occupation of filling the waste-basket with contributions from the "funny men." "What's that, father?" "A 'chestnut,' my son."

Has Been an Excellent Senator.

Rochester Post: Hon. D. M. Sabin is a candidate for re-election with a fair show of success. He has been an excellent senator and in all the questions pertaining to the control of corporations and the protection of labor his record has been particularly good and in accord with the popular sentiment of the state. He has well represented the mass of the people.

Col. Graves for Speaker.

The members of the legislature from the south part of the State should bear in mind the condition of the north part, which has a population equal to the south part, but not a tithe part of her representation, and should concede to us the speakership. This is no more than fair and right, and if conceded will afford a precedent for action when the conditions are reversed, as they will be in the near future. In presenting the name of Col. Graves we present the name of a man who is the peer of any in the whole State—a man who would represent all interests fairly and impartially. Give us Graves for speaker and thus you will do all that can be done to render our present condition bearable.

The Washburn strikers are trying to make capital for their cause by circulating the story that Col. Graves is working hard for Sabin. They will approach a Graves man and threaten to everlastingly sacrifice Graves if the aforesaid man does not immediately proceed to whoop'er up for Washburn. The fact is that Mr. Graves has taken no active part in the Senatorial question and the attempt to draw him into it so as to injure him through it, is a despicable trick worthy only of pot-house politicians. It would seem from this that the Washburn men are inclined to tie to Morgan and think by this thin-skinned lie to furnish an excuse. Their cause must be getting desperate indeed when they have to resort to such means.

The Sault Ste. Marie R. R.

Farm, Stock and Home.

From advance sheets of the Minnesota railroad commission we learn that the total cost of the Sault Ste. Marie railroad and equipment, from Boynton, Dakota, to Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., 787 miles, was $37,021,739.92, but of this sum there is one item of "interest and discount charged to construction" of $17,205,365.15, or almost one-half of the entire claimed cost. Upon investigation it was found that this "interest and discount" item was in the shape of "income bonds," which were taken by W. D. Washburn & Co., at 133 mills on the dollar, a clear case of "watering" to the extent of about $15,000,000, or in other words making another involuntary mortgage on the productive industries of the Northwest, which, at the low rate of 6 per cent, will require the payment of an annual interest of $900,000. This is submitted as one of the easy methods by which such mortgages are made, and also exhibits a method through which a man may get rich enough to be entitled to a seat in the United States senate.

Some people seem to have the erroneous idea that advocating the appointment of Hon. John L. Gibbs on the Board of Railroad and Warehouse Commissioners, interferes with the chances of a Fifth district candidate. It is generally conceded that the Fifth district will get one and the other will be selected from the south part, probably Hon. John L. Gibs or Gen. J. H. Baker. As between those two we believe the sentiment of the valley is in favor of Gibbs by a large majority. He is a practical farmer, one whom the farmers all know and respect and we believe, that, could our people vote upon the question of which shall be selected, Mr. Gibbs would have a large majority. At any rate this is the sentiment that we have heard freely expressed by many leading farmers and others up here. We believe it is the sincere desire of Gov. elect Meriam to know the wishes of the people in this important matter and to satisfy all reasonable requests.

The St. Paul Globe says that re-apportionment has met its death-blow because southern republicans are afraid that it would give the democrats an advantage. If there is any southern republicans, of any prominence, who is fool enough to take any stock in such old-wives' tales, we just want to whisper gently in his ear that if we don't get re-apportionment at this session this whole Fifth district will be ready to join the democracy, commit suicide or do some other desperate deed. It is a matter that we will put up with no foolishness on. We have not much of a voice in that legislature it is true but we have at the polls and if our interests cannot receive proper attention at the hands of our friends that voice is mighty liable to be heard in a protest that will tell. But it is not necessary to borrow trouble on what the Globe says. It makes mistakes sometimes, (see official count of last election) and we believe the idea that re-apportionment is dead, is as big a mistake as its placing Minnesota in the democratic column. The legislature cannot afford to leave us out in the cold longer.

State Press.

Little Falls Transcript: Sabin and his friends are as confident of success men can be in a political fight, and the nature of a senatorial fight makes it possible for the managers of the campaign to know very closely what their strength is.

Todd County Argus: Col. Graves, of Duluth, seems to have the inside track in the race for the speakership. There is no question as to his ability and if the speakership is to be conceded to the northern part of the state he will be the man.

Rushford Star: Public sentiment in this section since the senatorial fight narrowed down to Sabin and Washburn has become considerably Sabinized, and from present indications a stampede of the legislative members to Sabin would would meet with almost universal approval.

Evening Star: Col. Graves, of Duluth, would seem to have the inside track for the speakership of the Minnesota lower house. In fact his election is conceded by Washburn and Sabin men alike. Mr. Graves is an accomplished gentlemen, a successful business man and a good republican. There is every reason to believe that he will make an honest, competent and popular speaker.

Duluth News: G. G. Hartley, returned from St. Paul Wednesday and felt pretty good over the chances of both Graves and Sabin. He said that from what he could learn Col. Graves was conducting a good canvass for the speakership. He was not working for either Sabin or Washburn, but for Graves. The Washburn people have declared their intended hostility to the colonel, provided he sides with Sabin, but he doesn't frighten. Every indication points to a successful issue for Duluth's favorite.

Todd County Argus: Sen. Sabin's allegiance to the republican party cannot be questioned. We do not advocate the election of Mr. Sabin but the simple fact that the democrats would prefer him to Mr. Washburn is nothing to urge against him. The democrats are certainly as deeply interested in the welfare of this state as the republicans and as they have no hope of electing one of their own party they would naturally have a preference among the republicans. If this is all that can be urged against Mr. Sabin there are little grounds for opposition to him.

Minneapolis Tribune: Col. Graves was looking especially happy whenever his chances for the sperkership were mentioned. He said he thought his strength was growing steadily and he hoped to come under the wire a winner. Representative Hoppin was asked what the sentiment was in southern Minnesota over the speakership. He said he thought there was a disposition to look with favor on on the man from Duluth. 'The people in southern Minnesota are fair-minded,' he said. 'They recognize that the fifth district is entitled to recognition. The district does not have as many members as it ought to have, and if the district asks for the speakership, perhaps southern Minnesota will help the district to get it.'

Sabin and the Railroad.

Motley Register.

During the discussion, in 1886, of the granting of a franchise and right of way through the Indian Territory for a railroad to be built by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe railway company, an amendment was offered providing that the road should not be stocked or bonded for more than the actual cost of construction and equipment, Senator Sabin favored the amendment, and spoke as follows in support of it:

"It strikes me, Mr. President' that if the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe railway company will be prevented from building this 240 miles of railway by the adoption of an amendment which simply imposes upon them the condition of being an honest railway, it certainly is not a road worth building. Far be it from me to lay in the way of any railway construction in the West a single straw. I am myself a western man, and have seen the necessities of railway construction. We have been greatly benefitted by the construction of railroads, but we are to-day suffering. Our farmers are compelled to sell their wheat at fifty or sixty cents per bushel; our industries are languishing with overtaxed burdens, one of the most potent reasons for which is the large amount paid for the transportation of their products to market by corporations requiring excessive and arbitrary charges to secure the large amount of revenue necessary to pay dividends and interest on watered stocks which aggregate from two to four times the actual cost of the property. In the construction of this railway undoubtedly bonds will be placed to the full amount of the cost, therefore it is no hardship to have this new departure on the part of the representatives of the interests of the country incorporated in the bill. Our labor strikes would have assumed much less threatening proportions, if indeed not been averted entirely, if the railroads on which those strikes have occurred were simply bonded and stocked for the amount of their cost. I shall vote for the adoption of this amendment and every other of like purport that is presented."

In doing this, Senator Sabin championed the cause of the people, and his manly words met with a hearty response from the press and the farmers of this state. Not only in this, but in many other ways, and at all times, Senator Sabin has been faithful to the people.

Lake Superior News: The News was, perhaps, the first paper in the state to point out the fact that Gen. Washburn's railroad interest at once placed him in a position antagonistic to the interests, not only of Duluth, but of the entire state. This view is now being taken by many of the state journals who had not before given this subject consideration. The Le Sueur News, heretofore non-committal, says: "The people demand a man in whom they can expect true and honest representation; one who stands closest to their own interests and has not any pet railroad legislation to bias and influence his vote, at the expense of the masses of the people; one of whom they can approach with that freedom and familiarity that gives them as assurance that they are cheerfully heard and that their requests will be most faithfully and diligently looked after. Just such a man they have in Senator Sadin.

Duluth Evening Herald: The Washburn senatorial star rose in a blaze of glory but after it had reached almost the zenith of the political sky it did not look as well as the fellows who had forced it up there thought it would. In fact they were a little suspicious about it any way, for although many supposed it was sailing around proudly on its own hook its steady descent soon convinced all that a string was tied to it. It was just elevated for the sake of an experiment, and the experiment was not a howling success. Perhaps the weather has been too worm, or perhaps the Sabin planet was so brilliant that it just out-shone the little Minneapolis twinkler as soon as it reached this latitud. Any how Washburn is a goner and all the politicians are agreed on that point.

Warren Register: Sen. Sabin is now at home fixing his fences for another term. But politics like the weather, is "mighty onsartin." W. D. Washburn and his friends are making a strong effort to tear down Sabin's barricade, and capture the senatorial clover patch. Well, so far as these two gentlemen are concerned, the Register occupies about the same neutral position taken by the woman while her husband was fighting with a bear, and who manifested her impartiallity by crying out "Go it old man, go it bear, I don't care which whips." The Register don't happen to belong to that class of papers in the State of Minnesota, which believe the country will "go to the demnition bow wows" unless either Sabin or Washburn is elected. We have other preferences (several of them) and we hope one of them may prove to be the "dark horse" and carry off the prize. Neither Sabin nor Washburn is better qualified for senator than many other good and competent men in the state. Hence we see no necessity for the tearing of our nether linen concerning the matter, as many of our exchanges are doing at the present time.

Douglas County News: Washington, D. C., Dec. 20.—Knute Nelson won a decided victory today with his Chippewa Indian bill, which was before the house on a conference report from the Senate. Holman, of Indiana, and Payson, of Illinois, were strong in their objection to its passage, and fought it with much determination. Their opposition was, as they said, based on the belief that the lumber from the lands would be gobbled up by the lumber syndicates and railroad corporation and the settlers would receive no benefit from the law. The real secret, however was based upon the fact that the two gentlemen named as members of the public laws committee, did not want any legislation upon the subject without it being done by authority of their committee. After about an hour's debate and slight filibustering, the conference report was agreed to by a vote of 131 to 32, and Nelson was the happy winner.

Ortonville Herald-Star: The make up of the next railway commission is a matter of considerable interest to the people of this section. Of the three members of the present board, John L. Gibbs, we believe is the most deserving of a reappointment. He has always been industrious in looking after the interests of the people and the character of his services entitle him to a second term. Mr. Gibbs has many warm friends in Big Stone County who would commend Gov. Merriam's choice most heartily were it to fall upon John L. Gibbs.

McKINNON BRO'S,

Duluth Evening Herald: For some time the firm of political brokers, Mc & Mike, have been doing a very light business. Their stock has been diminished so much, and their trade has been so small, that their opinion of the market has not been considered of much value. However, from force of habit they occasionally say something, and once in a while their remarks reach ears which have the inclination and desire to make them public. In the holiday lull in the senatorial fight some one has found leisure to let the public know that the firm is opposed to the re-election of Senator Sabin. That should be good news to the Sabin men. It proves that the Stillwater man has no interests in common with the Democracy. If the firm's desires in this matter can have any effect whatever it will be to strengthen Sabin's candidacy. The disposition this year is to elect just the man that the Democrat's dont want, Sabin is lucky.

Marshall County Leader: Upon Gov. Merriam will devolve the duty of electing a new board of railway and warehouse commissioners. This board is really of very great importance to the state at our present stage of railway development, and it is unfortunate that the salary paid should be so small, compared with the amount of talent and experience required. The people should have the services of three experts whose time is worth $10,000, and it would be very difficult to find such men for $3,000. There is a strong feeling up this way that Gen. Becker should be retained on the democratic side and Jno. L. Gibbs from the republican. Every one holds the opinion that although Mr. Gibbs may not have had much railroad experience, yet his service on the board for the past two years has qualified him for a continuance.

Statehood for Dakota.

The Orange Judd Farmer gives the following good reasons why Dakota should be a state:

Here are some official statistics concerning Dakota covering the ground to the 30th of last June: The population of Dakota was then 620,823, nearly 400,000 of whom reside south of the forty-sixth paralell. Complete tables from the official returns of the eleven land offices in the territory show there were 12,070 new filings under the general land laws, embracing 1,838,142 acres. There were 10,455 final proofs of titles acquired to 1,615,650 acres. The grand total of lands newly filed on and purchased by immigrants for settlement for the year ending June 3th, closely approximates 2,500,000 acres, or 3,000 square miles, an area twice twice that of Deleware. There are yet subject to homestead and pre-emption in Dakota 22,245,948 acres. During the year 1883 there were constructed 842 miles of railroad in the Territory, making the total mileage now in operation 4,333.

In agriculture, the chief industry of Dakota, wonderful progress has been made. In 1860 less than 1,000 bushels of wheat were raised. The years later the crop amounted to 17,662 bushels, and ten years later (1888), 2,830,289 bushels. In 1885 there was 38,186,413, and in 1887 there were 241,511,726 bushels of corn. Of late years the stock industry has received no little attention. The valuation of cattle, horses, hogs and sheep now reaches many millions of dollars. In Southern Dakota this industry has taken the place of wheat growing industry, and the farmers are getting rich. The total assessed valuation of Dakota for 1888 is $161,420,927.20. The estimated wealth of the Territory is $320,000,000. In 1880 the assessed valuation was 20,000,000. It will be seen that the increase has been wonderful.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

CROOKSTON, MINN., JANUARY 3.

Graves is All Right.

Hokah Chief: The speakership for our next house is assuming no dangerous aspect to date. The most prominent candidates on the surface at present are Graves of Duluth and Morgan of Albert Lea, a northern and a southern. Some think Morgan contracted somewhere a large gall bump. The gall bump is all right but in this instance it seems to be located in an effective spot and working the matter for all it is worth. This prominent and honored position should not be given on such substance, especially when that is all he has to bank. The gall of a man who never held a seat in the house to have such aspirations is amusing. Graves of Duluth has been there many times; is smart, well liked and was elected by the largest majority of any representative in the state. What's the matter with Morgan? He's all wrong. What's the matter with Graves? He's all right.

The Question of Pensions.

Minneapolis Tribune: A bill has been introduced into congress and referred giving to every soldier of the war now living and who has passed the age of 50 years, a pension of $12 per month. The passage of this bill would be tardy justice, but it would still be justice. A very large proportion of the men now living who fought for the cause of the union are not rich. At the formative time of life, the period when men were selecting and entering into the active prosecution of employments which were to be their life work, they were called by the urgent needs of the times. For four years they were engaged in the demoralizing employment of destructive warfare, and suffering from the exposure such emploment renders necessary. The close of the struggle found them without employment; many of them suffering from wound and disease; and all more or less unfitted to enter into competition with those who had remained at home and prosecuted legitimate callings. They had been paid $11 and $13 per month, in a currency which had depreciated to an extent that at one time made their pay only a little more than $4 in honest money. The promises made to them to induce enlistment were profuse and sweeping, and practically none of them have been carried out. As time wore on the singular injustice and ingratitude shown to them embittered their lives. Laws pretending to grant pensions were placed upon the statute books, but most of these acts paid a premium on perjury and offered a reward for rascality. Veterans were compelled to make affidavits for themselves or their comrades as to the existence of facts 10 or 20 years before, which they might recall in a certain shadowy fashion, but could hardly be sure of, until finally, every honest old soldier with feeling for the partners of his former toil adopted the rule, "give the comrade the benefit of the doubt," and was ready to swear recklessly so that simple justice might be done to one more of the old-time friends.

The plan adopted by congress was simply monstrous. If it had been contrived in the interest of carelessness or dishonesty the scheme could not have been better devised. But the better rule is embodied in the bill introduced at the present session. Give pension to all—either graduated on length of service, or, as the bill just introduced provides—to all over 50 years of age. It is not a gratuity but the liquidation of an honest debt. This money was earned by the men who risked life, health and limb to conquer the wicked southern rebellion—earned and never paid. The men who furnished money have been paid over and over again, for capital is organized to protect itself. But the men who furnished the bone and brawn have not been paid. The debt is honestly due them, and the Republican party is publicly pledged to render unto these veterans the full payment for all their sufferings and toils.

New Board Of Railroad Commissioners.

Moorhead Daily News: There is undoubtedly a strong sentiment among the farmers of the state, which is not confined to any particular section, for the reappointment of John L. Gibbs as a member of the board of railroad and warehouse commissioners. Mr. Gibbs undoubtedly retains the confidence of the farmers in an eminent degree. He is a practical farmer himself in the true sense of the word, and in this he differs from several other farmers for political glory and success. The News is of opinion that the retention of Mr. Gibbs will be satisfactory to the farmers of the north, as the member of the board from the southern counties. But we desire to emphasize most emphatically the point that, should Governor Merriam decide to retain Mr. Gibbs, that circumstance will not satisfy and exhaust the claims of the north for representation on the board. Mr. Gibb's retention will simply be agreeable to the north so far as he satisfies and fills the claims of the southern counties for representation on the board. The time has come, however, when the northern counties demand representation in the important state positions by its own residents. It has been represented by proxy, the proies residents of the counties south of St. Paul, just as long as the people of the north will put up with. There should be entire unanimity on the part of the north in asserting its demands in this respect. The north sees the situation in about this light: Gen. J. H. Baker, of Blue Earth county, is an active and powerful candidate for appointment on the board, Hon. John L. Gibbs of Freeborn county likewise. Only one of these gentlemen can receive the appointment. Here the line is drawn. Governor Merriam undoubtedly sees this very much as we do. The competition between Gen. Baker and Mr. Gibbs should result in the success of one and the failure of the other. Both cannot succeed, for the reason that the vast region north of the Twin cities should be recognized and undoubtedly will be recognized by Governor Merriam when he makes up his list of appointments to the board. The Twin cities ought to have one member, and Gen. Becker if he desires to remain, would be satisfactory to them as well as the state. In selecting the commissioner from the north, it is the agricultural interests which should be cosulted and recognized as the controlling factor and not the commercial interests of Duluth. Let the governor select a representative honest farmer of the north or a man whose interest is in harmony with the farmers and whose sympathies are with them.

"It cannot be denied that the senatorial outlook has changed somewhat in the last few weeks. Mr. Washburn and his friends got in their work early, and the Washburn tide ran high. To some it looked as if he would have a walkaway. But with Senator Sabin's return his friends have rallied around him, and a decided Sabin hue has begun to be visible in the political sky. The contest will not be so uneven as some suppose. Mr. Washburn will not have a walkaway. Senator Sabin is a very formidable candidate for the succession to the seat he now occupies, for another term. The Evening Star is simply speaking from a news standpoint, and giving the situation as it appears to a close observer. This paper will endeavor to give the actual facts of the progress of the fight and leave misrepresentation and coloring to the partisan sheets and organs. The actual fact is that Senator Sabin has made some striking gains during the last week or two."

Duluth Evening Herald: Senator Ingalls is not a civil service reformer and he is not ashamed to acknowledge it. He believed the civil service was all right before the passage of the so-called reform laws. In the course of a recent interview on the subject he said:

"Nine-tenths of all the clerkships in Washington could be acceptably filled by any intelligent young man of 18 after two weeks experience; and I do not understand why the incumbent should have the oil of consecration rubbed upon his head and be assured that he will not be ousted by the party which he opposes. I can hold office for only six years, and then I become an office seeker and go back to my state and lay down my record and my claims and say, 'Gentlemen, here I am, here is what I have done; if you acquiesce, I should like to go back.' And they put me on trial, and weigh my services and decide my case on what they regard as my merits. Why should a $1,260 clerk be exempt from trial, the trial which the president faces every four years? Why should he be greased with some noli me tangere ointment, and be made an exception to the general rule of responsibility to the people?

Duluth Evening Herald: Charles A Gilman says the Princeton Union, is the only northern Minnesota man that was ever elected speaker of the state legislature—he presided in 1878 and 1879. Since then, Loren Fletcher, of Minneapolis, has filled the position two terms; John L. Gibbs, of Freeborn county, one term; and at the last session, Wm. R. Merriam wielded the gavel. This winter, Col. C. H. Graves, of Duluth is a candidate for the position, and his most formidable opponent is D. F. Morgan, a Freeborn county lawyer. In all fairness, northern Minnesota is entitled to the speakership this time, and no one can question Mr. Graves, ability or integrity. Under the present outrageously unjust apportionment the northern portion of the state has comparatively few representatives, but it is to be hoped that the members from the southern and central districts will recognize the justness of the claims of the Duluth man, the representative of a constituency of 75,000 people.

Todd County Argus: It is evident from the following which Chas. Canning gave to a Globe reporter that the result of the election soured him. In regard to the senatorship he says:

"Mr. Washbun can also spare a little change for political strikers to help elect crossroad lawyers to the legislature to assist in this election. The Manitoba has its representative in Mr. Comstock; and it is only fair that the Minneaplis & Pacific should be represented in the councils of the nation. The Falls of St. Anthony, it is said, are sadly in need of repair, and $1,000,000 of the surplus would help the poor millers fix their dams. The farmers ask nothing, nor should they have anything. They are merely the voting cattle for the party in power. There is no use in our protestations, the man who has the most money gets the office. Let us join the procession and shout, 'Gold is king!'. Let the juggernaut's car roll on and crush hepless farmers who throw themselves beneath its wheels.'

He manages to get in his little fling at Mr. Comstock, but no one would want to deny him this small boon. It is a harmless little fling but it serves to show that Mr. Canning is as narrow minded a man as he was charged with being before election. We believe that there is too much of this demagogic rant about our country going to the dogs. There may be abuses that need correcting, but our laws are not framed for the purpose of robbing the many to enrich the few and our public men are not all the subservient tools of corporations as Mr. Canning and others of his ilk would have us believe. Such talk breeds anarchy, as there are many people who are ready to believe it and come to view everything in this unnatural light.

Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty and the people should be awake to their interests, but the blather of demagogues should not be heeded. The first steps have been taken in the government control of railroads and this great reform should be steadily but carefully pushed on to success. There are a few men who hold radical views upon this question who are doing the couse harm by intemperate discussion. A man who says the country is going to the dogs because he was not elected to some office can be safely set down as a demagogue and an unfit man to put in a responsible position.

Minnesota's Future.

St. Paul Globe: Did it ever occur to you to take a glance at the United States as it will appear when the Dominion of Canada is annexed to this republic, and to see what position Minnesota will occupy on the map? If you haven't, take down your map of the North American continent and bound the future great republic of the earth. By the annexation of the Dominion of Canada twenty-seven states and territories will be added to the Union. And there will sit Minnesota, like the crown jewel in the cluster of gems, the center state of the Union, the pivot of our geographical possessions, the axis of the continental hub. There she will be, equi-distant from the Atlantic and Pacific, from the Polar sea and the Gulf. There she will be, the center of population, the center of commerce, and the center of agricultural wealth. It will surely be a proud day for Minnesota when Canada is annexed and becomes a part of our national domain.

The Minneapolis Star, which is one of the most pronounced Washburn papers in the state, has the following to say about the situation:

STATE OF MINNESOTA, County of Polk.—ss. In Probate Court. Special Term, December 24th, 1888.

In the matter of the estate of Margaret Barrette, deceased.

Whereas, An instrument in writing, purporting to be the last will and testament of Margaret Barrette, deceased, late of said county, has been delivered to this court.

And whereas, Joseph Barrette of said Polk County has filed therewith his petition, representing among other things, that said Margret Barrette died in said county on the fifth day of December 1888, testate, and that said petitioner is the sole executor named in said last will and testament, and praying that the said instrument may be admitted to probate, and that letters testamentary be to him issued thereon.

It is ordered, That the proofs of said instrument, and the said petition, be heard before this court, at the probate office in said county, on the 21st day of January A. D. 1889, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, when all concerned may appear and contest the probate of said instrument.

And it is further ordered, That public notice of the time and place of said hearing be given to all persons interested by publication of these orders for three weeks successively previous to said day of hearing, in THE POLK COUNTY JOURNAL, a newspaper printed and published at Crookston in said county.

By the Court.
C. O. CHRISTIANSON,
Judge of Probate.

MORTGAGE SALE.

[First publication Dec. 6th, 1888.]

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of two hundred and eleven dollars and sixty cents, ($211.60,) principal and interest, due and which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by Emeline Henion, a widow, to Smith W. Fisk, bearing date the twelfth day of March A. D. 1887, and duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the eighteenth day of March A. D. 1887, at 11 o'clock and twenty-five minutes a. m., in book "29" of mortgages on pages 248 and 349, said mortgage was made to secure the payment of a promissory note of even date therewith, for the sum of two hundred dollars ($200.00,) payable on or before one year from the date thereof, made by said Emeline Henion, payable to said Smith W. Fisk or order and delivered by said mortgager to said mortgagee at the date thereof, and whereas, the power of sale in said mortgage contained has become operative, and no action or proceedings at law or otherwise has been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, and the premises described in and covered by said mortgage, viz: Lots ten (10,) twelve (12) and fourteen (14,) in block three (3,) in Grand Forks East, according to the recorded plat thereof on file, and of record in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for said County of Polk and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances, said premises being situate in said County of Polk, will be sold at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest and ten dollars attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the costs and disbursements allowed by law, which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said County of Polk, at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said county and state, on the first day of February A. D. 1889, at 10 o'clock a. m., of that day, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated, December 3d, A. D. 1888.

SUPPLEMENT.

ASKING TOO MUCH.

The Twin Cities Trying to Gobble Up All the Offices.

Locality Should Have Something to Do with the Selection of a Senator.

St. Charles Union: The senatorial question is absorbing a good deal of the attention of the newspapers of the state. The subject, we think, was prematurely sprung—in advance of any demand by the people—by Messrs. Washburn and Sabin and their personal adherents, in order to create a boom for them, and rush one or the other of them into the position, without due consideration, on the meeting of the legislature. Many of the state newspapers, allured by the shining appearance of the bait when it was first thrown out, bit at it, though without swallowing the hook. Most of them now wish they hadn't done it. They began to see that the Twin cities and their suburbs mean to gobble every office within the gift of the people of the state at large, under the plea of non-sectionalism! Great Scott! If this is non-sectionalism, it would really be an interesting piece of information to know exactly what their definition of sectionalism is. The term, as we understand it in this particular instance, simply means an undue favoritism toward one locality, to the exclusion of all other localities. This is exactly the ground occupied by the Twin cities and towns immediately surrounding them. They totally ignore all of Minnesota with the exception of about 20 miles square. The state papers are getting their eyes open, and there is now quite a general demand for a more equal distribution of official distinction.

Is It Consistent?

Slayton Gazette: Bro. Miller, of the Rock County Herald is a very able writer, and publishes a most excellent newspaper, but even editors are sometimes inconsistent. The Herald is supporting Gen. Washburn for United States senator and at the same time it claims to be opposed to boodle campaign methods. Gen. Washburn is a millionaire. In the late campaign his great wealth enabled him to defray "campaign expenses" of numerous candidates for legislative honors. At that time he had his eye on a seat in the United States senate, and he well calculated that many of the successful candidates thus aided would consider themselves under obligations to vote for him. Supposing Washburn were a poor man, and some rival candidate for the senatorship had defrayed the "expenses" of these legislative candidates, who would receive their votes? Surely not Mr. Washburn. Under these circumstances, is it not his money that enables him to be so prominent a candidate for the senatorship? Is not the very thing the Herald preaches against—boodle—the most prominent factor in his campaign? In view of these facts, so well known to all familiar with the workings of the senatorial contest, the Gazette can not reconcile the following extract from Brother Miller's able editorial on "boodle" with the Herald's position on the senatorship:

"The money power in politics is the one that has destroyed more than one republic. Personal influence may lead a man to desert his principles, but in his allegiance to his friend there is an element of nobleness. Money exerts only a degrading influence. It is becoming a recognized fact that rich men only "need apply" for the highest offices in the gift of this people. Go to the United States senate and count the millionaires. No greater evil can befall any nation than to have its government fall under control of any class of citizens. The capitalist has now a hold upon our legislature which need cause alarm. No great reform has ever come from the favored class in society. The capitalist of today may have been the laborer yesterday, but he forgets the laborer's interests sooner even than the man who inherited wealth. The labor interest must be represented by its own class."

Truer words than the above were never uttered. Nevertheless we find the Herald supporting a man whose money certainly "only exerts a degrading influence" in politics. It says, "go to the United States senate and count the millionaires," and at the same time it seems to want Minnesota represented in that body by a millionaire. It is justly alarmed because the "capitalists have a hold upon our legislature," but at the same time it demonstrates its inconsistency by aiding a capitalist in his efforts to tighten his grasp on the legislature. It frankly admits that "no great reform has ever come from the favored class in society," but in spite of this declaration it advocates the election of one of this "favored class" to the senate in order to promote the interests of all classes.

The Herald is doubtless supporting Gen. Washburn because it considers him the best man for the position. But in its devotion to his cause it upholds and practically justifies what it condemns in its editorial of last week—boodleism. Advancing fine theories for the suppression of this growing evil, and then supporting candidates who principally rely upon their great wealth for their political successes, will certainly never discourage the practice.

We fear that the editor of our highly esteemed contemporary is like other men of moral training and education. He assents to moral platitudes when applied abstractly to politics. Most men will deprecate the use of money to purchase votes, and they will condemn corruption. But when the campaign opens their inconsistency is manifest. It is one thing to say, "I condemn these vicious practices," and quite another to say: "I will not support Boodler because he relies upon them for success." In every reform movement this inconsistency is painfully apparent. We say painfully, for consistency is essential to the triumph of virtue in any self-governing community.

If the Herald would be consistent, it must practice what it preaches. So long as it supports any man who uses his wealth as the main lever to hoist him into popular favor, Brother Miller's immaculate bosom will not be adorned with that rare and most beautiful jewel—consistency.

A Man of Desirable Qualifications.

Lake Benton News: In the coming race for senatorial honors between Sabin and Washburn, it is a matter for the legislative body to select the fittest of the two honorable gentlemen to occupy the all important position. Let them carefully review, analyze and dissect, if they please, and discover anything to blacken or defame the irreproachable character of Mr. Sabin. He is a man of the desirable qualifications best suited to fill the office well as he has done. His administration has been such that he is entitled to a second term. Mr. Sabin is the friend of commerce, the friend of the working millions. On the other hand Washburn is the friend of railroads, particularly his own dear little Soo. On the hypothesis that soiling another will never make one's self clean, we desist from digging up a ragged past to taunt its flutters. Mr. Washburn is a millionaire, his grasp is like Hugo's devil fish when he gets a firm grip on anything that advances his interests he never relaxes. Such is the peculiarity of Mr. Washburn that his warmest interest is usually manifested in himself. Mr. Sabin is for the people and with the people and is held in high esteem by the people.

Can Water Stock.

Scott County Argus: Has W. D. Washburn brains enough to write a bill that would be presentable to the United States senate? He comes from an illustrious family; has been fairly successful as a stock waterer, but we doubt if he has any more legislative ability than the law allows. He certainly is not a statesman, nor does he approach one in experience in deliberative proceedings of public affairs.

Washburn's Bluff.

Winona Republican: In the present instance it will require 61 votes to nominate the choice of the republican members. At the present writing—all assertions to the contrary notwithstanding—no one candidate can confidently count on even two-thirds that number. Mr. Washburn's adherents are already claiming for him the certainty of a clear majority on the first ballot, but this is sheer "bluff."

Davis on Sabin.

Minneapolis Star: Senator Davis is probably the most enthusiastic exponent of the Sabin boom. Said he to a St. Paul friend recently: "Senator Sabin is truly a wonderful man. Of the entire senate there is not a man who commands such attention and wields such universal influence. He often is absent from his seat during a session for several days. When he returns the pigeonholes in his desk are full of measures pending. Mr. Sabin gathers them up and presents them, and no other senator meets with such general support from the members of the senate. It is marvelous to note how many measures Senator Sabin can push through in a short space of time. He has won his popularity by avoiding all opposition and by a system of co-operation."

A Former Supporter of the Twin City Candidate Withdraws.

Le Sueur News: The News has always entertained a very kindly personal feeling towards Gen. Washburn and has, at times, been inclined to think that he was the man who should be sent as the senator to represent this state, and has given his (Washburn's) friends so to understand, but we are advised, on unquestionable authority, of railroad transactions which surely convince us that he is not the man who should be elected and it is not without pain that we are forced to believe it—and believing compels us to refrain from advocating his election. The people of this state want a man in whom they can expect true and honest representation; one who stands closest to their own interests and has not any pet legislation to bias and influence his vote, at the expense of the masses of the people.

Locality Has Nothing to Do With It if the Twins are Satisfied.

Owatonna Journal: There may nothing in locality as some of the big papers preach. But if this be true, why should Senator Sabin be kicked out to give place to a Minneapolis man who is no improvement in any respect? Oh, no! locality has nothing to do with it.

Passing Strange.

Pipestone Star: Now it will appear as remarkably strange that Senator Sabin could be a "shrewd political trickster," a "political schemer," "no statesman," etc.—as applied to him by the Rock County Herald—and yet be the subject of such an ovation by the entire United States senate, as mentioned above, and still further bear such intimate relations with President-elect Harrison as to place him in the possibilities of a cabinet position.

Surely there must be a mistake somewhere. Our usually bright neighbor must have been warped, when making his estimate of Senator Sabin, by something more than a real knowledge of what he was talking about, for certain it is that on ordinary occasions we know Mr. Miller would not admit, through his paper nor in conversation, that President Harrison or the republicans of the senate would recognize a political villain, as he makes Senator Sabin out to be, much less of ovating him and even tendering him a cabinet position.

The Star has no axes to grind in this matter nor political grudges to liquidate. It doesn't make a farthing's difference to us who is elected senator. But in discussing the merits of candidates through the public press there should be at least a certain degree of consistency.

Washburn in Danger.

Slayton Gazette: W. D. Washburn's greatest danger in his senatorial aspirations is that he may be killed by his over-enthusiastic friends. The Pioneer Press says that "Mr. Washburn has done more for Minnesota than all other aspirants put together." Pretty soon they will tell us that there is nobody at all in this state excepting Gen. Washburn. Then they will find out that there is.

Can't Get in the Band Wagon.

Lac Qui Parle Press: As the newspapers of the state seem determined to have about so much to say about the election of a United States senator, we don't propose to be left in the rear, but will have our little say with the rest, and that is that W. D. Washburn can't have a seat in our band wagon. We have no room for railroad magnates so long as men of brains and statesmanship are left standing by the wayside.

Would Not Work.

Little Falls Transcript: It appears that the "popular movement" that the Minneapolis Tribune has become so enthusiastic over for its candidate for United States senator, was as much to hold the Hennepin delegates solid as to impress the outside legislators. In both particulars it failed dismally.

No Room for Railroad Presidents.

Madison Press; As the newspapers of the state seem determined to have about so much to say about the election of a United States senator we don't propose to be left in the rear, but will have our little say with the rest, and that is that W. D. Washburn can't have a seat in our band wagon. We have no room for railroad magnates so long as men of brains and statesmanship are left standing by the wayside.

Started too Soon.

Stillwater Gazette: The St. Cloud Times says that "somehow or other the sound of the Washburn 'boom' is not 'resounding through space' as much as it did when the 'photographs' were cut out. Maybe it was started too soon." It does appear to have been started too soon, judging from present indications. That photograph boom proved a dismal failure.

Good Advice to the State Press.

Lac Qui Parle Press: From the way the papers of the country are booming W. D. Washburn for the United States senate, we are afraid they will boom him through without much regard as to whether there are better or more capable men to be found in the state or not. In our opinion Wakefield, or Nelson, or Lind, or Donnelly, any of them come nearer the mark of being a statesman than does Mr. Washburn, who though a capable and enterprising business man cannot possibly be classed among statesmen. The country newspapers ought not to lose their heads in this matter. It isn't always conducive to the best interests of the state for us to get to soaring away among the clouds over the candidacy of any man, and we would advise the fraternity to come back to earth.

A Kind Word for Sabin.

Jordan Independent: The press in favor of Washburn's candidacy for senator are reporting that Sabin has withdrawn from the contest in order to damage his chances. Sabin is still in the ring, and we would be pleased to see him chosen in preference to Washburn.

The Fate of Forced Booms.

Princeton Union: There is such a thing as over-booming a candidate. Remember Gresham's fate. A forced boom is worse than no boom at all.

Entitled to Be His Own Successor.

Little Falls Transcript: Senator D. M. Sabin is a candidate for re-election, and if the proper performance of duties and able service to the state are the determining factors in the election, he will be his own successor beyond a doubt. Mr. Sabin has been a power in Minnesota politics many years, and his friends are today more numerous than ever before.

Alarming.

Lac Qui Parle Press: It is now said that failing in an election to the United States senate, Washburn will shake the dust of Minnesota from his feet forever and take up his residence in New York city.

In the Bouillion.

Northfield News: At this distance it looks as though Mr. Washburn will be in the bouillion when the senatorial contest is ended.

He Has Faith.

Zumbrota Independent: If W. D. Washburn is elected senator it will be an illustration of the old saying, "money makes the mare go." But we have too much faith in Minnesota's representatives to believe that he will get there.

Money to Buy Pictures.

Swift Monitor: We notice Washburn's "phisog" at the head of several of our republican exchanges. It is not likely that said papers take such a personal interest in Gen. Washburn as to purchase a cut of his face and publish a half-column of "gush" in connection with it. It takes money to buy pictures, and Washburn cannot be accused of not having plenty of the wherewithal.

Don't Want a Political Dynasty.

Albert Lea Enterprise: The politicians are grooming Washburn, of Minneapolis, for United States senator. There are already too many millionaires in the senate, sent there by republican legislatures, and Minnesota should not follow suit by the election of another. Some honest and brainy man in whom the people have confidence, outside of Minneapolis and St. Paul, ought to be elected.

Here is the Test.

Preston Republican: The question to be considered is, would Mr. Washburn protect the best interests of the whole people regardless of personal and local interests? If the legislature soon to assemble is worthy of the confidence of the electors of Minnesota it will elect no one to the United States senate whose past record is not an affirmative answer to this question. A pledge from some of Minnesota's distinguished men would be worthless.

THE ISSUE FAIRLY STATED

The Twin Cities Have Had More Than Their Share—Give the Country a Show.

Little Falls Transcript: While we have no other than kindly feelings toward the great Twin cities of Minnesota—St. Paul and Minneapolis—and rejoice in their progress and prosperity, we nevertheless consider that other sections of the state are entitled to at least equal consideration. It has been proven in the past that what these cities have regarded as calculated to advance their especial interests has not always been calculated to advance the interests of other portions of the state. The future is not likely to produce any change in this respect. The coming legislator should consider whether there is not already sufficient political power concentrated in these cities without increasing it. Senator Davis and Governor-elect Merriam from St. Paul, with Representative-elect Snider from Minneapolis, would seem to sufficiently provide for the twins without placing the other senatorship in the hands of Mr. Washburn, of Minneapolis. A reasonable self-respect on the part of the legislature should prevent any such result.

There are 47 senatorial districts in the state, and these districts send 150 senators and representatives combined to the legislature. The two cities, with Anoka and Isanti counties added, comprise five districts and are represented by five senators and 21 representatives, a total of 26 members in both branches. The remainder of the state has 124 senators and representatives. The population represented by the 26 already have one United States senator, and it seems only a matter of political equity that the population represented by the 124 should be permitted to supply the other senator. The business interests of the Twin cities are absolutely identical, but not always identical with the state at large and for 42 districts out of 47, or 124 members out of the legislature, to abandon the interests of their constituents and surrender to the 26, is a betrayal of the political trust which has been reposed in them.

Minnesota—territory and state combined—has had the office of governor 39 years. During that period St. Paul and Minneapolis have furnished the governor for 20½ years and, if we add the first term of the governor-elect, 31½ years. Hence, taking a period of 41 years (the end of Merriam's first term), the entire state outside of these two cities has only furnished the executive officer nine and one-half years.

The term of our first United States senator began in May, 1858, over 30 years ago. During that time St. Paul has had one of the senators continually, and for two years both. Counting Senator Davis' term to the date of its expiration in March, 1893, and St. Paul will have had the senatorship continually for 35 years, or if we add the two years when both were from St. Paul 37 years, while all the rest of the state has been contented with 33 years' service of the single senator. It is not enough that these cities, whose corporate limits touch each other, should continually and, apparently, perpetually have one senator, without the 124 outside members of the legislature lying down at the feet of the 26 and tendering them the remaining one?

During the same 30 years the two cities have furnished a representative in congress for 20 years and have a member-elect for two years. For 14 of the 30 years the congressional district which embraced these two cities contained over two-thirds of the state, and for nine years more over one-half of the state, so that it cannot be claimed that these cities were entitled to the member of congress, except that the remainder of the state bowed down before them, as Mr. Washburn's friends now desire to have done in the senatorial matter.

During the eight territorial legislatures, four of the presiding officers were from St. Paul, and out of the 30 speakers of the house since Minnesota became a state, 11 (or over one-third) have been supplied by these two cities. The presidents of the senate and the speakers largely shape legislation by the formation of the committees, and great political as well as business advantages result from controlling these positions.

There is no law which requires the people to elect a congressional representative from a given district in which he resides, but it would be regarded as an anomaly if the five congressional districts in the state should select their congressmen from St. Paul and Minneapolis. The people of the various districts would resent such an imputation upon their ability in a very emphatic manner. It is no less an anomaly for the two cities to ask for both senators, and only an assurance fairly monumental would have conceived such an idea.

It is with no desire to excite local or factional jealousies that we cite these facts, but to ask whether, both as a matter of political and business fair play, some locality outside of the two cities should not receive the senatorship at the hands of the legislature this winter. The country representation is almost five to one as against the Twin cities. It is, of course, a matter entirely within the control of the country members to decide. If they do not think sufficient political honors have been heaped upon these cities; if they do not think any other portion of the state is entitled to consideration; if, like Uriah Heap, they desire to be especially 'umble and acknowledge the inferiority of all the remainder of the state, they will insist upon handing Mr. Washburn the senatorship upon a silver platter. It is presumable that he will be willing to buy the platter as a token of his appreciation of the humility.

No More Second Terms.

Preston Republican: The republican machine has declared against second terms and second termers in Minnesota. The defeat of Gov. McGill in the last state convention was the first clear announcement of the new party doctrine, which is to be made general in all the counties of the state. Just now it is being applied to the United States senatorship. The machine is moving against an endorsement of Mr. Sabin and has announced in advance its determination to lay aside Cush Davis when he calls for a second term. What has produced this change in party practice is an interesting topic. The masses have not moved in that direction. They have given the matter scarcely a thought. Their duty is discharged when they obey orders and vote the party ticket; but they may take it into their heads, when their present legislators return from their political boot blacking and class legislation gambling, to lay them away among useless party rubbish. We hope our Fillmore county representatives may deserve promotion. If they do the National Republican will proclaim them worthy and do what it can to show its appreciation of legislative integrity.

Reducing the Tariff on Lumber.

Rochester Post: Senator Sabin has offered an amendment to the tariff bill reducing the duty on lumber 50 per cent, or rather from $3 to $1 per thousand feet. The impression prevails that the amendment will pass the senate and house both. Sabin's amendment is in harmony with republican sentiment as expressed in the tariff debate last summer. There is hardly a democrat who will oppose the amendment, yet it may meet with opposition from the delegation from Maine, who want the highest possible tariff on the article.

Sabin Gaining.

Pioneer Press: There is an air of confidence among the Sabin men that is at least assuring to the friends of the present incumbent. They assert that Mr. Sabin is gaining strength every day, and when the time comes for balloting he will be far in the lead. On the other hand, Alvah Eastman says that the Washburn men feel afraid that Sabin will drop out of the race. There are other Washburn men who acknowledged a few days since that the chances were not so good for their favorite as they were two weeks ago. This may account for the statement that some of the leaders are out on missionary work.

Representative Dunn is "On."

Princeton Union: The senatorial fight wages hot—in the newspapers at regular advertising rates.

Washburn a Miller King.

Heron Lake News: W. D. Washburn is a miller king and as such is a great and powerful figure in the control of the wheat market of this state, and as such should know the abuses that the producers receive at the hands of such men. Mr. Washburn is the president of a railroad and we understand, a powerful faction is the directory of another. Are such institutions working for their own interests or for the good of the people in general? We do not say that Mr. Washburn would pervert his duty if elected, but we would ask, where would his interests lie? Is it to be expected that any man will work against his own interests? If so he would be dishonest with himself; how could you expect him to be honest with others? We would ask every man to consider these facts and if they do, and speak honestly from their convictions, Senator Sabin will succeed himself without an honest dissenting vote.

There is no question but what Senator Sabin will be returned, but we want to see it by such a voice that no one will have ground to doubt that the people of Minnesota fail to appreciate his noble efforts in their behalf and understand full well how to reward such worthy qualifications and actions.

A Strange Combination.

Fairmont News: Strange that it is to the St. Paul Globe that we must go for information regarding the fact that Senator Sabin does not object to a republican legislative caucus. The Globe is democratic and Senator Sabin is—senator.

Yes it is a little remarkable that D. M. Sabin, United States senator from Minnesota and ex-chairman of the national republican committee, is ignored by the republican papers of the Twin cities and that republicans must read the democratic Globe to find any items of news favorable to Senator Sabin, and to an outsider it is suggestive of the thought, that while Sabin was busy in Washington with his senatorial work, Mr. Washburn got in his work in a substantial and convincing way.

A Roast for a Railroad President.

Glencoe Enterprise: The senatorial fight is becoming interesting. There are plenty of candidates willing to accept the office, but in our opinion some of them are not the right kind of timber to represent the great state of Minnesota in the United States senate.

Two Ways of Looking at It.

Wabasha Democrat: Gen. Washburn seems to have the lead in the senatorial race, if the mercenary press of the state is any criterion, and then there is another class of newspapers that think that way.

Attention.

If you do not want Railroad President W. D. Washburn to represent you for the next six years in the United States senate, you must look to it now and see that your own representatives and senator do not vote for him. It will be too late after election by the legislature; your influence will then be useless. Work now by letter and by personal action; don't rest until you have the promise you want. And if you think D. M. Sabin is in sympathy with your interest, and has been a faithful member, work now in like manner, and don't stop until he is elected. Until the election by the legislature is over, the matter is in your control. Do your duty and do it now.

The Country Press and the Senatorial Contest.

[Minneapolis Star, Dec. 28.]

One of the brightest country editors in the state sends us the following communication, which we give the prominence of our editorial columns, because the information therein contained is valuable, and it seems to give a fair analysis of the position of the press of the state on the senatorial issue:

To the Editor of the Evening Star:

The bright spot in the senatorial contest now on appeared in the STAR of Dec. 24, when it had the courage to announce that it was a newspaper, and intended to print the news regardless of the effect that it would have upon individuals.

Your review of the senatorial situation strikes me as correct, and I congratulate you on this new departure in twin city journalism. The plain truth, shorn of all covering, is that no candidate or aspirant for the office of United States senator, except Mr. Washburn, could heretofore get a fair and impartial showing in any of the daily papers of the twin cities. So far as I am concerned, I am not a bitter partisan in the contest, but I firmly and honestly believe in fair play and justice to all men. The partisan dailies of Minneapolis and St. Paul have studiously avoided giving a fair show to any candidate except Mr. Washburn; and some of his close friends and a few of his managers have used methods which you and I would condemn in any political contest. They have in a number of instances worked up newspaper articles in the country, by threatening editors who happened to be applicants for place in the legislature, with political destruction if they did not climb into their wagon. In two or three instances they have gone further, and used innocent parties by threatening a loss of influence in certain portions of the department of state.

I notice in the Tribune an article entitled "The state press on senator," and it strikes me that it is about as unfair an article as I have seen for some time. While I have only had a few moments to look over this matter, I notice that the article in question is glaringly incorrect. It claims 52 papers in this state are enthusiastically supporting Mr. Washburn, while I take the liberty of saying that 14 of the 52 are not today for Mr. Washburn as will be seen by the following hasty review:

The following papers claimed for Washburn are in truth for Sabin:

Crookston Journal.
Heron Lake News.
Midway News.

And the following claimed for Washburn are not for him, but are booming other men:

Herman Enterprise.
Detroit Record.
Isanti Press.
Pine Island Journal.
Dawson Sentinel.
Brainerd Tribune—6.

And the following set down in the Washburn column, express no decided preference one way or the other:

Faribault Republican,
Delavan Herald,
Warren Sheaf,
Fairmount Sentinel,
Benson Times—5.

This leaves Washburn 38 out of 300 papers in the state, or about 13 per cent. of "sentiment" is for him.

In addition to the 13 papers claimed for Mr. Sabin in the Tribune, I find the following print articles favoring him:

Ellsworth News.
Windom Reporter.
Spring Valley Mercury.
Wadena Pioneer.
Verndale Journal.
Norman County Index.
Glencoe Register.
Rock County News.
Fisher Bulletin.
Rushford Star.
Preston Republican.
Duluth Herald.
Chisago County News.
Pipestone Star.
Crookston Journal.
Heron Lake News.
Midway News.
Zumbrota Independent.
Hubbard County Enterprise.
Minnetonka Mirror.
Lakefield Standard.
Marshall News-Messenger.
Rochester Post.
Grand Meadow Record.
Janesville Argus.
Worthington Globe.
Glaquet Pine Knot.

This makes 40 papers for Mr. Sabin and there is good reason to believe that as between Mr. Sabin and Mr. Washburn the following papers favor Mr Sabin:

Winona Republican
Duluth News.
St. Charles Union.
Farmington Tribune.
Lanesboro Journal.
Battle Lake Review.
Zumbrota News.
Waterville Advance.
Brown's Valley Reporter.
Central Minnesotian (Glenwood)
Henderson Independent.
Hutchinson Leader.
Long Prairie Argus.

Add these to the 40 and we have 54 most likely for Sabin on the roundup.

The following seem to be decidedly for a "dark horse" or new man:

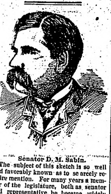
Albert Lea Standard.
Madison Press.
Herman Enterprise.
St. James Journal.
Bird Island Union.
Albert Enterprise.
Litchfield News-Ledger.
Austin Register.
Austin Transcript.
Atwater Press.
Beaver Falls Times.
Glencoe Enterprise.
Red Wing Republican.
Hastings Gazette.
Cambridge Press.
Princeton Union.
Dawson Sentinel.
Delevan Herald.
Detroit Record.
Elbow Lake Herald.
Glyndon News.
Litchfield Review.
Pine Island Journal.
New Richland Star.
Willmar Republican-Gazette.

A majority of the country democratic papers favor Mr. Washburn.

I am a diligent reader of the country papers, and have given the above as the result of my reading and observation. To my mind it is a fair and impartial review of the situation among the country papers.

I have reason to believe that there are a number of papers for Mr. Sabin not given above. I have avoided quoting any democratic papers in this review, so far as my knowledge extends.

This is by no means a one-sided affair, as can be seen by the above; at this distance it looks as though the "STAR" was right when it said, "Mr. Washburn is beaten today."



Senator D. M. Sabin.

The subject of this sketch is so well and favorably known as to scarcely require mention. For many years a member of the legislature, both as senator and representative, he became widely known throughout the state as a careful prudent man in public affairs, and his course in that position met the approval of his constituents, as numerous re-elections testify. Six years ago he was elected United States senator, for which position he is again a candidate. As senator Mr. Sabin has made an enviable record and has discharged the duties of the office in a manner which has reflected credit on the great state which he represents. He has always been a thorough republican and is highly respected by the leaders of the party throughout the country. He has a strong support in his present canvass and his chances of re-election are excellent. We append a few extracts from the press of the state showing the esteem in which he is held by the people.

Senator Sabin and the Farmers

[Minneapolis Star, Dec. 27.]

A friend has handed us a copy of the Farm Stock and Home, of April 15, 1886, containing favorable notice of a speech made by Senator Sabin in the senate on the 8th day of April, of that year. That day, says the paper from which we quote, was a notable one in the senate. "The words "farmer" and "agriculture" were heard there for the first time in years. A few plain truths were spoken about monopolies, and it fairly took the breath out of the apoplectic old hulks of wheezy millionaires, vastly too many of whom damn that body of historic power and glory with their superannuated mental and physical infirmities."

The question up for discussion was the granting of a franchise and right of way through the Indian territory for a railroad to be built by the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad company. An amendment was offered providing that the road should not be stocked or bonded for more than actual cost of construction and equipment. Senator Ingalls, of Kansas, opposed it, affirming that with such a provision there would be no inducement to build the road. Senator Sabin then took the floor and made what the Farm, Stock and Home at the time called "a splendid speech in favor of the amendment." He said:

"It strikes me, Mr. President, that if the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe railway company will be prevented from building this 240 miles of railway by the adoption of an amendment which simply imposes upon them the condition of being an honest railway, it certainly is not a road worth building. Far be it from me to lay in the way of any railway construction in the West a single straw. I am myself a Western man, and have seen the necessities of railway construction. We have been greatly benefitted by the construction of railroads, but we are today suffering. Our farmers are compelled to sell their wheat at 50 or 60 cents a bushel; our industries are languishing with overtaxed burdens, one of the most potent reasons for which is the large amount paid for transportation of their products to market by corporations requiring excessive and arbitrary charges to secure the large amount of revenue necessary to pay dividends and interest on watered stocks which aggregate from two to four times the actual cost of the property. In the construction of this railway undoubtedly bonds will be placed to the full amount of the cost, therefore it is no hardship to have this new departure on the part of the representatives of the interests of the country incorporated in the bill. Our labor strikes would have assumed much less threatening proportions, if indeed not been averted entirely, if the railroads on which those strikes have occurred were simply bonded and stocked for the amount of their cost. I shall vote for the adoption of this amendment and every other of like purport that is presented."

The amendment was beaten, notwithstanding Senator Sabin's manly fight for it, and the Senate thus committed itself to the doctrine that railroads should be permitted to stock and bond themselves for many times their actual value. Senator Sabin's speech at the time was widely quoted in the country papers and made him many friends among the farmers. The EVENING STAR recalls the incident simply as a matter of justice to the Senator.

SENATORIAL GOSSIP.

Recent charges that Washburn's campaign has been poorly managed are not altogether without foundation. Gen. Washburn's chances were much brighter six weeks ago than they were today.—Minneapolis Journal, Dec. 27.

The fact that the firm of "Me & Mike,"—Bosses Kelly and Doran—are bitterly opposing Sabin, won't hurt him any with republican members.

E. A. Sumner: "The senatorial fight is waxing warm and no man has a sure thing. Senator Sabin is working hard and gaining headway, as I am informed."

D. J. Knox, of Aitkin, is quoted as saying:

"I think the outlook for Sabin is much better than it was two weeks ago or on the 1st of December. In our section of the state I think the legislative members favor him in preference to Washburn."

Waterville Advance: W. D. Washburn is the choice of the Twin cities for United States senator, but after counting noses one is impressed with the idea that Minnesota will have something to say about it.

Minneapolis Tribune: Stories have been going the rounds that Mr. Sabin and his friends did not want a caucus, and that they would not go into one and abide its results, but thought their chances better in a free-for-all fight in the halls of the state house. These stories were not correct.

Senator Sabin was questioned yesterday by a Tribune reporter, and frankly answered:

"I favor any method of procedure that the dear people want."

"Will you go into a caucus?"

"Yes, I am in favor of a caucus."

"Will your men abide by the results of the caucus if one is held?"

"Most certainly we will. If a caucus is held we will stay with the results of it."

AN ENEMY OF THE STATE.

Why One of the Candidates for United States Senator Should Not be Chosen.

The GLOBE recognizes the fact that the senatorial fight now raging in Minnesota, does not concern its political family. The large Republican majority in the legislature renders it certain that a Republican will be chosen, but though in a political minority, Democrats have as much interest in the progress and development of the state as other citizens. It is on this ground that the GLOBE proposes to discuss the matter from a purely business and non-political standpoint.

No one will gainsay the fact that the interests of our producers, consumers and business men generally, lie in reaching by the shortest possible route, the great chain of lakes which afford Minnesota such important and vital protection.

Any business which can be advanced by dwarfing the carrying trade of Lake Superior, or throwing impediments in the way of the great improvement demanded for the Sault Ste. Marie canal, is hostile to all the business interests of Minnesota and every individual within her borders, save those who may be fostering the scheme.

W. D. Washburn, who is one of the prominent candidates for the senate, has staked his entire business interests upon a scheme which can only succeed by diminishing, if not destroying, the value of Lake Superior to this state. A glance at the accompanying map, and a comparison with a similar but ineffectual attempt to dwarf Chicago and Illinois, will forcibly illustrate the point at issue.

The distance by rail from Chicago to Toledo is 234 miles. The distance by circuitous lake travel from Chicago to Toledo is 800 miles, and from Toledo to Buffalo 300 miles. It was perhaps not surprising, before the experiment had been tried, that business men should have conceived the idea that such an enterprise as the Wabash system, extending from St. Louis to Toledo, on Lake Erie, and designed to build up St. Louis and Missouri at the expense of Chicago and Illinois, would prove a great success. They know a great deal better now.

The Wabash road was built with a view of taking the carrying trade from Chicago, on the theory that the additional rail haul would be overcome by the lake transit of 800 miles to reach a point only 234 miles distant by land. If it had proved a success the incalculable damage to Chicago and Illinois, and even the states of the Northwest, is apparent. But natural laws of trade are not easily reversed, and the Chicago & Alton, the Rock Island, the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy and other roads which took the shortest route to deep water at Chicago, prospered, while the Wabash fell into hopeless bankruptcy, and there remains. The problem was solved for all time, and it was demonstrated that the shortest rail route to deep water is the developer of the country as well as the financial success of the railroad.

The situation in Minnesota is almost relatively the same. The short distance by rail of 150 miles from St. Paul and Minneapolis to deep water at Duluth, gives Minnesota a grand opportunity for development. Instead of the lengthy and circuitous lake route even under which Chicago and Illinois prospered, the route from Duluth to Buffalo by the lakes is almost in a direct line. The distance is about 1,000 miles as against 1,100 miles from Chicago to Buffalo. Taking St. Paul and Minneapolis as about the center of population in Minnesota, though not geographically the center, and adding the rail mileage, we have from this center to Buffalo, via Duluth and the lakes, a distance of 1,150 miles, and via rail to Chicago and thence by lake to Buffalo 1,500 miles. The noonday sun could not be clearer than the fact that all of Minnesota's interests lie in reaching the lake with the least possible rail haul.

In the face of this and the Wabash experiment, Mr. Washburn has constructed his Soo route, a distance by rail from St. Paul and Minneapolis to his lake port at Gladstone of 342 miles, or to the Sault Ste. Marie of 494 miles.

If the intelligent reader will again glance at the map he will see that the drying up of Lake Superior from the Soo to Duluth would be directly in the line of Mr. Washburn's business interests, and the only thing which can ultimately save his road from the fate of the Wabash, while the short rail routes to deep water at Duluth prosper, and the whole region of country prospers, from the development of the lake service.

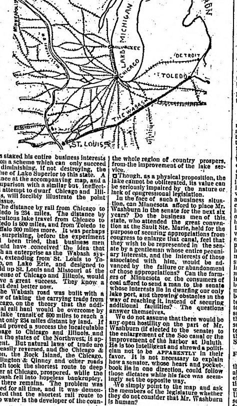
Though, as a physical proposition, the lake cannot be obliterated, its value can be seriously impaired by the nature or lack of congressional legislation.

In the face of such a business situation, can Minnesota afford to place Mr. Washburn in the senate for the next six years? Do the business men of this state, who attended the great convention at the Sault Ste. Marie, held for the purpose of securing appropriations from congress to enlarge that canal, feel that they wish to be represented in the senate by a gentleman whose entire pecuniary interests, and the interests of those associated with him, would be advanced by the failure or abandonment of those appropriations? Can the farmers of Minnesota or the consumers of coal afford to send a man to the senate whose interests lie in dwarfing our only lake port, and throwing obstacles in the way of reaching it, instead of securing additional facilities? The questions answer themselves.

We do not assume that there would be any open hostility on the part of Mr. Washburn (if elected to the senate) to the enlargement of the Soo canal or the improvement of the harbor at Duluth He is too intelligent and shrewd a politician not to be APPARENTLY in their favor. It is not necessary to explain how a senator, whose heart and pocketbook lie in one direction, could follow those dictates while his face was seemingly set the opposite way.

We simply point to the map and ask the members of the legislature whether they do not consider that Mr. Washburn is human?

—From the St. Paul Globe.



THE MONEY POWER.

What the People of Pipestone County Think of It.

Pipestone Star: The question of who is to be the United States senator to succeed Senator Sabin, has thus early become a leading topic of discussion, not particularly among the people, but among the politicians, and already a large number of newspapers throughout the state have taken a hand in the matter, for the cultivation of public sentiment, of course, and thus to, in a measure, influence the state senators and representatives who will have the electing to do.

In this part of the state things were drifting along very quietly, until last week the Luverne Herald came out flatfooted for W. D. Washburn, of Minneapolis, and in its great enthusiasm for the milling and railroad magnate was led into intimating that the people "of this district" are unqualifiedly in favor of that gentleman.

That the Herald may be—or feels itself to be—authorized to speak for the people of Rock county upon this important matter we will not now question, but we rather think that the people of Pipestone county, will, in the light of the recent legislative contest in this district, look upon the Herald speaking for them as rather presumptuous, to say the least of it.

To be more plain about it, the Star desires to give the Herald to understand that the people of Pipestone county are not for Mr. Washburn for United States senator. If the coming contest is to be narrowed down to Mr. Sabin and Mr. Washburn, the people of this section are in favor of Mr. Sabin.

And we do not give this as our opinion merely, but after a careful investigation of the feelings of people, well up in the knowledge of Minnesota men, from a residence of 35 years in the state, and this expression of feeling is not given to liquidate any past or present political grudges against any of Mr. Washburn's adherents, but for good and sufficient reasons of interest to the whole people of this district, of which we shall have more to say in the near future.

Farmers' Alliance Against Washburn.

Graceville Transcript: The executive committee of the Farmers' alliance met in St. Paul last week, and resolved to buck the candidacy of Hon. W. D. Washburn for the United States senate. They will go in for Donnelly on the start and then turn to Sabin.

Prefers Sabin.

Carver County News: During the past week we have had the opportunity of interviewing a number of county politicians on the senatorial question and we find an almost unanimous sentiment in favor of the return of U. S. Senator Sabin, who, they claim, has done conscientious duty during his present term and that he is much to be preferred to Washburn, on account of his strenuous effort against railroad monopolies and watered stock fosterers, of whom Washburn is one of the most virulent.

Washburn's Popularity Mythical.

Mankato Free Press: The boasted popularity of Gen. Washburn in this part of the state is largely mythical. That gentleman is not well enough known, nor has he ever manifested the interest in Southern Minnesota which would leave in the hearts of our citizens the warm feelings which are so loudly claimed for him. In Minneapolis we suppose there is some such feeling, and doubtless should be, but the attempt to convey the impression that the farmers and business men of this part of the state are dead in love with a kid-gloved railroad president and millionaire whom they have never seen and seldom heard of is as perfectly ludicrous as it should be ineffectual. Privately Mr. Washburn certainly has few interests in common with our people, or at least has seldom shown that he has, and his public life has never been signalized by any marked efforts in behalf of the general public. Therefore, while we have no disposition to reflect on Gen. Washburn's ability or integrity, we must say that he has but feeble claim to the support of the representatives from this or neighboring counties. It is doubtless no fault of his own that he has not those qualities and disposition which characterize public or private individuals who become the people's favorites. He is not to be blamed, but his supporters who are misrepresenting things and would set up a fictitious sentiment are open to censure. Mr. Washburn, in the very nature and circumstances of the case, has no common interests with the people, and never will have, while his leading competitor, Mr. Sabin, has many, and is truly the sort of a man whom the people readily take to. He has shown during a term in the senate that he realizes what is good for the people of Minnesota, all classes thereof, and has intelligently planned for such legislation as will subserve the varied and important interests of the state. Wherever one reason can be assigned for support of Gen. Washburn at least three can be urged in behalf of Senator Sabin. Especially is this true in this portion of the state, and it will be found that among those citizens who are informed as to the merits of the two men, or have no petty spite to indulge, that a vast majority when questioned on the matter express the belief that Mr. Sabin has been more than faithful, and has earned the right of re-election.

Sabin's Chances Good.

Little Falls Transcript: The ridiculous failure of the policy of the St. Paul and Minneapolis papers to belittle the opposition to Mr. Washburn has been abandoned, and now it is conceded, directly or indirectly, by all his organs that Mr. Sabin's chances are apparently as good as his own. They are not yet fair enough to concede, however, that Mr. Sabin has any respectable support among the country papers of the state.

No Man Who Is Willing to Spend It Ought to Be Elected.

Glenwood Minnesotian: No man can get to the senate now without spending from $15,000 to $50,000.

THE MAIN QUESTION.

Washburn Too Aristocratic and Not in Sympathy with the People.

Grant County Herald: There is something more than merely a choice of persons involved in the present canvass for United States senator. If that were all, the matter would be one of small concern to any but the ones directly interested. In the approaching election of a United States senator a question of principle will be presented to the legislature for its decision, with a clearness, definiteness and distinctness rare in the history of politics. There is no opportunity for an intelligent man to misunderstand the issue, or to be confused as to its meaning. That honest men will sincerely differ on the question is certainly true, but proves nothing except that human nature is essentially different in different individuals, causing each to view the same subject from his own particular standpoint and his own peculiar light. No man who has not gone through the world with his eyes half shut has failed to discover that society is composed of two elements, the one identified with aristocracy, wealth, and concentrated power, the other including labor, production, and the masses. The former element is ever aggressive, the latter generally submissive. Between the two, no thoughtful mind need fail to distinguish and between the two the next legislature will be compelled to judge. Whatever may be said of the other candidates, it is no injustice to Hon. W. D. Washburn to say that he unmistakably embodies in himself all the characteristics of the former element. He is an aristocrat by birth, breeding and association. He not only possesses great wealth, but he represents all that the term implies. He is the ideal of concentrated power, being, with perhaps one exception, pre-eminently the railroad king and manipulator of Minnesota. These facts are not commented on for the purpose of reflecting on Mr. Washburn personally, for, as before stated, the question involved is not one of personality. The men in sympathy with the element which he represents will naturally flock to his support, and they are not to be blamed, for they only conscientiously follow their natural inclination. But will those who are opposed to this element and who are naturally identified with labor, production and the people, oppose him? That is the question, the decision of which by the next legislature is awaited with interest. Without the support of the latter class, Mr. Washburn can never become United States senator. With their support, he may be elected, but the people's interests will be betrayed.

The Senatorial Contest.

Little Falls Transcript: We hope members of the legislature will think and act wisely on the senatorial question. This is a seriously important matter, and each man should weigh thoughtfully the responsibility resting upon him. We have no unkind word for Mr. Washburn personally, but the interests of the people are at stake, and demand a measure of consideration by the side of which the interests of any individual are incomparable. No legislation of recent years has been of such vast importance to the country at large as was the enactment of the interstate commerce law. Its passage was a legislative interposition in the interests of the common country. It was a blow aimed at extortion, discrimination and centralization. It was an act demanding that the interests of the common people—the country people and the country towns and villages—be respected. Mark you, gentlemen, railroad presidents do not enact such laws. The interstate commerce law is imperfect as yet. There must be amendments still farther in the interests of the people; but those amendments will never be made by railroad presidents. Remember, too, that the great cities fought bitterly the interstate commerce law, and today they would gladly see that law snatched from the statutes and cast into the flames. Let not those who represent the country people and country interests of the state lose their heads in this matter. The election of a United States senator means something.

Farmers Don't Want Washburn.

Battle Lake Review: The farmers of this county, and they are the fellows we all pay a great deal of attention to about election time, are bitter in their opposition to Mr. Washburn. They do not want to see a railroad president elected United States senator. Mr. Donnelly seems to be the first choice among the farmers, while Attorney-General Clapp is the favorite with the business men, yet all could unite on either. In case neither of these men are able to carry off the prize, it is a Sabin county.

Sabin's Record.

Heron Lake News: The late national campaign will be recorded in history's page not as one of rabid partisanship, but as one of intelligent earnestness. The two parties, each acting as its respective champion of the principles of its conception, met on the field of mental persuasion and there battled with wit and wisdom until the bugle sounded—to ballot. The republican party was awarded the spurs of victory; and the contest was declared ended for the present. Men ceased contending with their neighbors and returned to their various employments, agreeable to abide by the silent decision of the ballots. The conflict was over, the prize awarded and all classes of people were glad that contention had ceased.

But now it apears that in this state the lull was only a breathing spell and that another crash—not directly between the two great political parties—but rather between a majority faction of the victorious republican party and its minority faction allied with the democratic party and Twin cities moneyed power, is now at hand. The prize contended for is the senatorial successorship of Senator Sabin. The champions are Senator Sabin and W. D. Washburn, respectively. What are the conditions and records of the two men? Sabin is a man of ability and intelligence. So is Washburn. Sabin has proven himself to be a friend of the people and the interests of this state by his actions in congress in upholding such measures as the interstate commerce bill, the restriction of the sale of oleomargarine, the support of all efforts against trusts and monopolists, the reduction of duties on lumber and sugar, the freedom of the ballot and in fact he has been on the right side of all legislation for the good of the many against the personal interests of a few. What more could the people demand of their representative in the higher house of congress? Nothing but his return to his proven place of trust. Not only do the people of his own state feel proud of his actions and of him, but see the respect he receives at the hands of his colleagues.

Hopes Sabin Will Be Chosen.

Motley Register: A preference for D. M. Sabin does not necessarily involve hatred of Mr. Washburn, or any other candidate; and while we believe it will be best for our state to return Mr. Sabin to the United States senate, we have no desire to belittle the qualifications or republicanism of his opponents. Mr. Sabin has served Minnesota for six years, and has performed this service in an able manner. He has been under fire a considerable portion of the time, owing to business adversity, but this has not caused him to neglect the interests of his constituents. During this period, he has occupied a distinguished place in republican councils, and he is now in position to serve us better than ever. It is well known that he and Senator Davis are in hearty accord upon public questions, and their united work during the succeeding six years will accomplish much toward placing Minnesota in the front rank among her sister states. It is also as well known that the senator enjoys the friendship and confidence of President-elect Harrison, and that their relations are very close and cordial, having extended through a series of years. These, together with many other considerations, unite in causing us to hope that our legislature will decide to choose Mr. Sabin as his own successor.

Windom Had Better Keep Out.

Duluth Herald: There is a report to the effect that ex-Senator Windom will visit Minnesota for the purpose of helping W. D. Washburn in his senatorial aspirations. Mr. Windom may have a revengeful feeling against Senator Sabin and he may have a desire to gratify it, but he is a prudent and diplomatic man and he will hardly bury himself any deeper in Minnesota politics by adopting any such course.

A Mistake Rectified.

Fairmont News: A great many people are disposed to make merry because Editor Hunt, of the Mankato Free Press, is opposing Washburn for senator after being first in the state of Minnesota to hoist that gentleman as the favorite son of Minnesota for the presidency. Mr. Hunt, in the humble opinion of the News, and this paper so expressed itself at the time, made a great mistake in its selection but the Free Press is a progressive paper and it can learn by experience and when it found out how easily Mr. Washburn's great claims on the people of this state were punctured in that case, it can easily be seen how natural it was for it never to be caught in the same trap again, all of which is perfectly consistent and reflects honor upon Mr. Hunt rather than otherwise.

Windom's Friends for Sabin.

Mankato Free Press: Hon. D. Sinclair, editor of the Republican, at Winona, one of Windom's warmest personal friends, completely explodes the reason that some of the Washburn senators and members are urging against Sabin, viz: That he secured his election by treachery to Windom. Said one senator: "I don't like Sabin because he was Windom's friend and conspired to defeat him." In an interview Mr. Sinclair says: "Hon. D. M. Sabin has made a very efficient senator, and I positively refuse to use as a lever an imaginary lack of fealty on Mr. Sabin's part to foist Mr. Washburn into the senate." The avenging of Windom's defeat has no part in this fight. He was a non-resident of the state, but a few aristocratic nabobs wished to again foist him upon an unwilling people, as they are today trying to foist upon the state a great railroad magnate, whose chief distinction is that he has built a lot of railroads, and put upon the market $17,000,000 or $18,000,000 worth of "income certificates," which, translated into plain United States, means watered stock.

A Matter to Be Closely Looked After.

Mankato Free Press: One of the enterprises which most interests the business men and farmers of Minnesota is the projected improvement of the Sault Ste. Marie canal in order to open as wide as possible the great water ways on the north which must certainly prove the salvation of the producing interests of the great Northwest. In the same direction, no one will gainsay the fact that the interests of our producers, consumers and business men generally, lie in reaching by the shortest possible route, the great chain of lakes which afford Minnesota such important and vital protection.

Any business which can be advanced by dwarfing the carrying trade of Lake Superior, or throwing impediments in the way of the great improvement demanded for the Sault St. Marie canal, is hostile to all the business interests of Minnesota and every individual within her borders, save those who may be fostering the scheme. The short distance by rail of 150 miles from St. Paul and Minneapolis to deep water at Duluth, gives Minnesota a grand opportunity for development. Instead of the lengthy and circuitous lake route even under which Chicago and Illinois prospered, the route from Duluth to Buffalo by the lakes is almost in a direct line. The distance is about 1,000 miles as against 1,100 miles from Chicago to Buffalo. Taking St. Paul and Minneapolis as about the center of population in Minnesota, though not geographically the center, and adding the rail mileage, we have from this center to Buffalo, via Duluth and the lakes, a distance of 1,150 miles, and via rail to Chicago, and thence by lake to Buffalo, 1,500 miles. The noonday sun could not be clearer than the fact that all of Minnesota's interests lie in reaching the lake with the least possible rail haul.

In spite of these facts so much against the success of their enterprise, a company headed by Gen. W. D. Washburn, a prominent candidate for United States senator, has built the new "Soo line" a distance by rail from St. Paul and Minneapolis to the lake port, Gladstone, Mich., of 342 miles, or to Sault Ste. Marie of 494 miles. Thus it is seen at a moment's reflection by any clear-headed person that the direct interests of this railroad enterprise in which Candidate Washburn is so thoroughly associated, lie in drying up Lake Superior, could such a thing be done. Though in physical reality the lake could not be obliterated, its value as a water way can be seriously impaired by the lack or nature of congressional legislation.

In the face of such a business situation can Minnesota afford to place Mr. Washburn in the senate for the next six years? Do the business men of this state, who attended the great convention at the Sault Ste. Marie, held for the purpose of securing appropriations from congress to enlarge that canal, feel that they wish to be represented in the senate by a gentleman whose entire pecuniary interests, and the interests of those associated with him, would be advanced by the failure or abandonment of those appropriations? Can the farmers of Minnesota or the consumers of coal afford to send a man to the senate whose interests lie in dwarfing our only lake port, and throwing obstacles in the way of reaching it, instead of securing additional facilities? The questions answer themselves.

We do not suppose that Gen. Washburn would be so dull as to court the disapproval of his constituents by an open opposition to the appropriations for widening the Soo canal, but after all that gentleman is only human and it would not be difficult for him to "turn some stones" in the interests of his pocket book, while at the same time appearing to favor the enterprise which promises so much for the business and producing interests of the state.

D. M. Sabin, Senator.

Wadena County News: The election of a United States senator at the coming session of the legislature will be looked upon with a great deal of interest by the people of this state. The two most prominent candidates for that office are Hon. D. M. Sabin, present incumbent, and Hon. W. D. Washburn, of Minneapolis.

Why not have Mr. Sabin succeed himself? There is no reason why it should not be so. Mr. Sabin is a staunch republican; has always worked for the interest of Minnesota and the Northwest, and is eminently fitted for the high position. During the six years that Mr. Sabin has occupied a seat in the senate he has served upon many important committees, and has made a record of which any man might be proud.

It matters little to the people from what section of the state the senator may come, although there are a great many who would like to see him come from some place outside of the cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis. There is an effort being made on the part of a number of papers favorable to Mr. Washburn to belittle Mr. Sabin. Such a course is unfair, unjust and above all disreputable. Let everything be fair and square in this fight.

Mr. Sabin will have the solid support of the younger element of his party in the legislature. He has always been favorable to that element and it is right that he should have their support. It is to be hoped that D. M. Sabin will succeed himself as senator from this state.

The Opinion of a Farmers' Alliance Paper.

Central Minnesotian: One of the most important questions to come before the Minnesota legislature this winter is a senatorial successor to Senator Sabin. Mr. Sabin is a staunch republican. We have yet to hear a republican paper besmirch his character. It is true he is a man of wealth, but so is Merriam, Pillsbury, Washburn. In fact it is difficult for a man to get office without wealth or wealthy backers. Mr. Sabin aspires to be his own successor. Knute Nelson is often spoken of. As to his views on this subject he is as silent as Grant on war policies. The "sage of Nininger," our friend Donnelly, is also a candidate. We're not going back on the cryptogram! After the lofty politicians of this generation—who sit on the pinnacle of court houses and henroosts—have passed beneath the mantle of oblivion, Donnelly will still live in literature as one of its famous children. But Donnelly can't be senator. Mr. Sabin is one of the most enterprising citizens of Minnesota, and if fates decree, will leave the office of senator with honors and credit.

The Political Greed of the Twin Cities.

Hokah Chief: The Twin cities are not entitled to all the representation in the senate, and the country members will soon make a tour with both heads knocked out.

A Page From Past History.

Caledonia Argus: If it is neither forgetfulness nor ignorance of local history there is a grim humor in the complacency with which the Washburn papers are urging a caucus and obedience to it. Do they forget or ignore that in the so called Davis-Ramsey contest of 1875, Washburn was really the force that defeated Ramsey? That it was Washburn men who refused to obey the caucus mandate.

Why He Opposes Washburn.

Windom Reporter: The Reporter is an anti-Washburn paper but thus far it has not shown its readers wherein Gen. Washburn is not an unsuitable man.—Mankato Register.

The Reporter opposes Gen. Washburn because it believes he represents railroad and monopoly interests, and if elected senator will work in the interests of the very corporations which the people are trying to control through the interstate law. Not longer ago than last June, upon his return from the East, did not Gen. Washburn "give it out cold" that he was not friendly to that law? Leading citizens of Mankato remember the interview and doubt the wisdom of entrusting the "hard-working" and "ever busy" Mr. Washburn with the office of senator.

A Strange Combination.

Winnebago City Press: Strange that it is to the St. Paul Globe that we must go for information regarding the fact that Senator Sabin does not object to a republican legislative caucus. The Globe is democratic and Senator Sabin is—senator.—St. Peter Tribune.

Yes, it is a little remarkable that D. M. Sabin, United States senator from Minnesota and ex-chairman of the national republican committee, is ignored by the republican papers of the Twin cities and that republicans must read the democratic Globe to find any items of news favorable to Senator Sabin and to an outsider it is suggestive of the thought, that while Sabin was busy in Washington with his senatorial work, Mr. Washburn got in his work in a substantial and convincing way.

Some Oppose the Twin City Bossism.

Mankato Free Press: The statement is being quite industriously circulated that the Free Press is the only paper in the state that is supporting the re-election of Senator Sabin, while all the remainder of editorial sentiment is directed as an avalanche in favor of Gen. Washburn. While we are not at all averse to be so classed, it is unfair to a large number of the most able or influential newspapers in the southern part of the state to say they are included in the alleged "tidal wave" which is "sweeping every county." Among many journals whose aggregate influence is not to be sneered at, the Winona Republican, Rochester Post, Windom Reporter, Fairmont News, Northfield News, Albert Lea Enterprise, Kasson Republican and Owatonna Journal, are enrolled against Washburn. These papers are not, to be sure, distinctly supporting Senator Sabin, but they are disposed to show him fair play, and do not attempt to depreciate his abilities or service to the state. They are, however, strongly opposed to Gen. Washburn, which indicates that the "popular wave in the southern part of the state," we hear so much about is a very feeble ripple.

Sabin Sanguine.

Hubbard County Enterprise: The senatorial campaign is now on in good earnest. Both sides claim to be confident of success. Senator Sabin is holding his forces well in hand, and though not saying much is sanguine of his election.

Dictating to the State.

Northfield News: Because the republican papers of St. Paul and Minneapolis have almost entirely excluded from their columns all reference to any senatorial candidate except Mr. Washburn some people have been led to believe that the contest is a sort of jug-handle affair. Not a paper in the two cities, not one, fairly represents the exact majority sentiment in the state. It seems strange that some papers dare not lift their voices against insolent railway corporations, or justly and reasonably criticise a railway magnate. The metropolitan papers should in a certain sense be the moulders of public opinion and it should be done in an independent and fair manner. Why have these papers taken up so unanimously the cause of one man? The people can answer this question without much thought. The fair way has hardly been found by our city friends. These cities have for years in a commercial way sapped the life blood from the country districts, and are preparing to do the same thing politically. The people of the rural districts should remember that they have it in their power to elect one of their own number; and they certainly will make a mistake if a man unfriendly to their interests is chosen.

Have Not Read the Papers.

Duluth Daily News: The Twin city papers are freely proclaiming that Washburn's election is sure and that an avalanche of sentiment for the Minneapolis statesman is sweeping every county. The organs of the slate makers evidently have not read the papers in the southern part of the state. Among the many journals whose aggregate influence is not to be sneered at, the Winona Republican, Rochester Post, Mankato Free Press, Northfield News, Albert Lea Enterprise, Kasson Republican, Owatonna Journal, are enrolled against Washburn. The popular wave in the southern part of the state is a very feeble ripple, in the big Fifth district we have looked for it in vain. In the counties on the western border of the state it does not appear. Hennepin and Ramsey, by the grace of the slatemakers, are for Washburn almost to a man, but they are not the state. It is, indeed, general belief that the interest of the Twins are opposed to the state at large. It won't do to have the state represented in the senate by one man from St. Paul and one from Minneapolis.

WASHBURN IS BEATEN.

A Careful and Exhaustive Review of the Senatorial Battle Field.

The Evening Star Gives an Impartial Summary of the Situation.

How Sabin Has Gained and Washburn Lost—The Former in the Lead.

[Minneapolis Star, Dec. 21.]

A few days preceding the late election the editor of the New York Herald commissioned a trusty reporter to make a careful canvass of the state of New York, in order that the Herald might lay before its readers the probable results of the election in that state, which were of great importance, because at that time it was generally thought that as New York went, so would go the country. This agent did his work faithfully, and just on the eve of election confidentially telegraphed his employer a statement of the conditions, which indicated that the state would go for Harrison unless some great change should be wrought in the meantime. The Herald was a staunch supporter of President Cleveland, but the editor, after reading the dispatch, handed it to his manager, with the sententious remark, "print that," and his order was obeyed. Its appearance created a great sensation, and excited a widespread discussion regarding the advisability of the publication, but the editor closed the controversy by saying: "The Herald is a newspaper. Its first and highest duty is to print the news." The figures of the agent were wonderfully verified by the result of the election and nobody now questions the wisdom of the authority which ordered their publication.

The EVENING STAR finds itself in much the same situation with regard to the pending contest for United States senator in this state. The expressions of opinion by the country press in favor of Gen. Washburn followed so closely upon the heels of the result of the election, were apparently so spontaneous and unanimous, and there was so little reference to Senator Sabin as even a possible candidate, that we were led to believe that Gen. Washburn's triumphant election was an assured fact, and that the legislature would be performing but a perfunctory duty in registering what appeared to be the settled and expressed will of the people.

The return of Senator Sabin from Washington, followed as it has been by some very strong expressions of opinion in favor of his election, has induced the EVENING STAR to devote some time and pains to a close and exhaustive examination of the situation, in which the claims of partisans of both candidates have been listened to with patience, and verified or disproven, as the case might be, with all diligence and industry. The results of that investigation have convinced us that not irretrievably, perhaps, but if he can pluck the flower of victory from the thorn of defeat in this case, the achievement will deserve to go down in history with Sheridan's famous ride from "twenty miles away." A battle once lost is not often retrieved.

The causes which have led to this predicament are not far away nor difficult to account for. First and foremost is the barrier which his autocratic proclivities and cold and impassive presence have built up into a Chinese wall around the goal of his ambition.

In the second place, his sanguine disposition, which assumes that all things come to those who wait, and which takes for solemn truth the adulations of partisans or the expectations of selfish friends, and leaves undone those common courtesies of life, which, while infinitesimal considered by themselves, in the aggregate have great weight in effecting results.

In the third place is his lack of organizing power; his ability to draw men to him and attach them to his cause, his want of that personal adhesiveness which makes ones' partisans enthusiastic and effective without money and without price and converts his following into an invincible phalanx of aggressive friends.

In the fourth place, he has made the irreparable mistake of entrusting the conduct of the details of his campaign to inexperienced and untried men—to those who are, comparatively speaking, unknown and uninfluential in the politics of this state, thereby ignoring those who have long been at the front, bearing, in the heat of the day, the burdens of political warfare.

If you ask his friends

WHY MR. SABIN SHOULD BE RE-ELECTED

they usually start out by citing the following extract from the Pioneer Press of Feb. 2, 1883:

"Much worse things might have happened than the election of D. M. Sabin to the senate. He owes his election largely to personal qualities, which stamp him as a natural leader of men. One thing at least, will be conceded, even by those who will most deprecate his election—and that is that no more capable representative of the general business interests of the state could have been elected than D. M. Sabin. He has certain attractive and popular personal qualities, which are often more conducive to a successful public career than the highest order of intellectual endowments. He has the personal magnetism of a frank, forceful, generous, large hearted man."

They say that this appreciative estimate of Senator Sabin was not the exuberant gushing of a partisan elated by victory, but the spontaneous tribute of a journal that had been earnestly supporting another candidate. It was fitting and generous of the Pioneer Press to grace its columns with such appreciative commendation in its next issue after his election, and how appropriate and deserved was its eulogium, his six years of faithful and efficient service in the United States senate has fully illustrated.

"No more capable representative of the general business interests of the state could have been elected than D. M. Sabin." With what possible higher qualification, they ask, could a man be endowed for meeting the responsibilities of this high position? When the general business interest is competently served,

NOTHING IS NEGLECTED.

It is when special or local interests are made paramount to the "general" business interest, and when, as now, a candidate is put forward because he belongs to a certain locality, and will serve that locality and make its interests paramount to every other, that it becomes important to the people of the state outside that narrow boundary to see that their senator in the future, as hitherto, shall represent the general business interests. Indeed this question of subordinating the general welfare to local benefit is assuming such importance in this state that it invites serious attention.

If Mr. Sabin possessed the high qualifications for a senator ascribed to him by the Pioneer Press before he was inducted into and charged with the responsibilities of that high position, how largely must the experience of six years of service have added to his capacity for future usefulness. This is an aspect of this controversy that the representatives of the people who are to decide it cannot afford to overlook. Moreover it should not be forgotten that the record of Mr. Sabin is before the people, and that in the earnest contest now going forward, his opponents cannot point to an official act that impugns that record. He is charged with no blundering, with no incompetence, with no dereliction; but his opposers concede as his friends claim, that he is eminently entitled to receive, and at the hands of an intelligent constituency he does receive, that highest of all encomiums, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

In this issue

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES ARE NOT INVOLVED.

The candidates are all supposed to be orthodox republicans, and characteristics that measure their relative fitness must be estimated on other grounds. Senator Sabin was inducted into the office six years ago with the qualifications so felicitously delineated by the Pioneer Press in the quotation given above, and his official career has made evident that this analysis was correct; that his accomplishments were not overstated, and to such ample ground-work is added six years of instructive experience. If no consideration, aside from the highest aptitude for discharging the duties of a representative of the entire state, with no partiality toward any locality were considered, the name uttered by every republican member of the legislature, when in the course of his official duty he is called upon to record his choice for United States senator, would be that of D. M. Sabin.

In addition it is urged in his behalf that more than 800 pensions have been granted, increased or restored by his energetic and attentive action, and that every bill that he has introduced has passed the senate and become a law.

The testimony of Senator Davis in behalf of his coadjutor is being effectively used to secure votes for Senator Sabin, and it is no secret that the former is a warm supporter of the latter.

Senator Sabin's canvass is being conducted with a vigor and strength of organization which has never been equalled in the notable contests of a similar character which have preceded it in this state. It shows a most skillful organizing power and a warm, judicious and effective support on the part of his friends which have wrought that wonderful change in the aspect of the campaign which we have described. When it is recollected that this has been done in the face of the united opposition of the daily papers of Minneapolis and St. Paul, it must be admitted that it has been a most gallantly fought battle on the part of Senator Sabin and his friends.

The impression is gaining credence in the Hennepin delegation that the choice of the legislature for senator will prove a dark horse. J. S. Pillsbury, R. B. Langdon and Judge John P. Rea each have warm supporters. It is conceded that Gen. Washburn is practically out of the race.

Suggestive Gleanings from the Country Press of Minnesota.

It has been given out by certain partisan papers that the country press of Minnesota is almost unanimous for W. D. Washburn for senator. In justice to Gen. Washburn it must be admitted that a very respectable number of papers advocate his election to the senate; but in the interest of fair play it becomes the duty of the EVENING STAR to correct the statements of the partisan sheets by showing that Senator Sabin has an equally strong representation among the papers of the state. The following voluminous extracts strikingly confirm the analysis of the attitude of the Minnesota press given in an article our editorial column today.

Odds in Favor of Sabin.

Carver County News: The fight will undoubtedly be between Sabin and Washburn, with odds greatly in favor of the former, or we are no prophet.

The People Favor Sabin.

St. Paul Globe: E. H. Dearth, editor of the Le Sueur News, was at the state house yesterday. "The senatorial fight," he said, "is attracting considerable attention in our district. Our delegation are in a measure pledged to Washburn, but the people generally favor Sabin, who I think will be elected to succeed himself. The state could not have a better representative in the senate than Mr. Sabin. He has opportunities for seeing that the interests of Minnesota receive a fair share of attention from the government, and his close association with the President-elect is something not to be lightly cast aside."

Want It Strong.

Ellsworth News: There is no question but what Senator Sabin will be returned, but we want to see it by such a voice that no one will have ground to doubt that the people of Minnesota fail to appreciate his noble efforts in their behalf and understand full well how to reward such worthy qualifications and actions.

Very Significant.

Le Sueur News: Nothing can be brought against Senator D. M. Sabin, and there is a change of sentiment in his favor in those portions of the state which have heretofore been pronounced for Washburn that is truly very significant. The people of this state want a man in whom they can expect true and honest representation; one who stands closest to their own interests and has not any pet railroad legislation to bias and influence his vote, at the expense of the masses of the people; one whom they can approach with that freedom and familiarity that gives them an assurance that they are cheerfully heard and that their requests will be most faithfully and diligently looked after. Just such a man they have in Senator Sabin. Now, we don't ask anyone to take a positive stand, or to commit themselves to Sabin or any other man until they have thoroughly investigated the whole situation, and all legislators who do this make a grave mistake.

Few Gaps.

Duluth News: Senator Sabin is in Minnesota, having paired with Senator Kenna. Considering that he has given most of his time to his congressional duties and little to looking after his fences, the gaps he will find are surprisingly few.

Is Satisfied With Him.

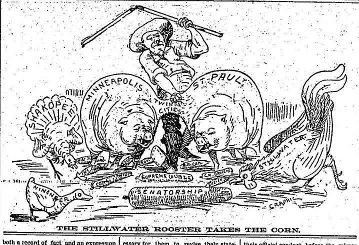
Heron Lake News: The News has unstinted confidence in the ability of the coming legislature and believes it will select a representative man, a man of recognized ability, a man who will honorably and faithfully represent the entire state, and one who is not tied up to clique or ring. A man who will represent us as well as has Mr. Sabin ought to be very acceptable to the people.

A Useful Senator.

Sauk Rapids Free Press: It is apparent that Senator Sabin commands the respect and friendship of his senatorial associates, is very popular in Washington society, and by reason of his noncombatant proclivities succeeds in drawing around him sufficient support as to insure the passage of measures in which the people of the state of Minnesota are interested.

Sabin Is Honorable.

Excelsior Mirror: In the midst of the senatorial contest which is developing strong friends for numerous candidates, it is easy to discover a disposition to smirch Mr. Sabin on account of prejudice against his connection with the manufacturing company at Stillwater. Investigating committees have justified him; numerous cases have been brought into court resulting in a vindication of Mr. Sabin. In business management or official capacity, Mr. Sabin has been honorable both to individuals and to parties. The desperate schemes to down him failed, and the strong language used by Senator Davis, who was not particularly friendly with Sabin, is both a record of fact and an expression of confidence.



THE STILLWATER ROOSTER TAKES THE CORN.

Given an Ovation.

Minneapolis Tribune, Dec. 6th: Senator Sabin made his first appearance in the senate this morning at this session. He entered the chamber about half an hour after the morning session had begun. He had not been in his seat more than 10 minutes when he was surrounded by Senators Quay, Cameron, Mitchell, Hiscock, Spooner and several others, who extended to the Minnesotian congratulations for the splendid result achieved in the North Star state. The ovation soon grew to considerable proportions, in fact to such an extent that the scene of welcome was transferred from the senate chambers to the marble room, when it seemed the entire membership of the senate left the inner circle and congregated on the outside to do honor to their colleague. Many of the democrats also joined the party and for fully one hour there was a round of senatorial merriment seldom seen. There was hardly one of them who did not make inquiry about the senatorial contest now going on there; and expressed a hope that Senator Sabin might be his own successor. Before the party broke up President Pro Tempore Ingalls left the chair and went out into the lobby and extended his congratulations also. Upon the whole, Senator Sabin was generously complimented on the victory in Minnesota.

Has Represented the People.

Rochester Post: The most important duty of the legislature to meet in January will be that of electing a United States senator. Hon. D. M. Sabin is a candidate for re-election with a fair show of success. He has been an excellent senator and in all the questions pertaining to the control of corporations and the protection of labor his record has been particularly good and in accord with the popular sentiment of the state. He has well represented the mass of the people.

Entitled to a Re-election.

Royalton Banner: Mr. Sabin was elected to the senate in 1883 to succeed Hon. Wm. Windom. He has now nearly completed his first term and is clearly entitled to a re-election. Mr. Sabin is not only an active and enterprising business man but an experienced legislator, having been elected to the state senate in 1871-72,73, and to the house of representatives in 1878 and 1881. He is an earnest republican and has several times been a delegate to the national republican convention. He was chairman of the convention that nominated James G. Blaine. Mr. Sabin is a man of fine ability, wide experience and influence, and Minnesota cannot do better than keep him where he is.

He's All Right.

Wadena County News: Senator D. M. Sabin is a candidate for re-election, and if the proper performance of duties and able service to the state are the determining factors in the election he will be his own successor beyond a doubt. He is a man whom the state of Minnesota and the republican party can be proud of as a representative in the senate, and he has certainly earned the endorsement of a re-election.

Sabin Well Thought Of.

Spring Valley Mercury: Senator D. M. Sabin is again a candidate for the senate. There have been many names suggested for the position, but of late the contest has narrowed down to two, D. M. Sabin and W. D. Washburn. For a while it seemed that the latter gentleman was to have a walkover. Since the election there has been a change. The country papers are disposed to speak their minds quite freely, and express themselves satisfied that Sabin has been a faithful senator, true to his party, and looking after the interests of the state. Sabin is well thought of in this part of the state and Fillmore county in particular.

A Kind Word For Sabin.

Jordan Independent: The press in favor of Washburn's candidacy for senator are reporting that Sabin has withdrawn from the contest in order to damage his chances. Sabin is still in the ring, and we would be pleased to see him chosen in preference to Washburn.

Mr. Sabin Ought to Succeed.

Kenyon Leader: We believe there is a strong and growing sentiment among the people of this part of the state in favor of the present incumbent. Mr. Sabin has ably represented the state during the past six years to the complete satisfaction of his friends and to the great disappointment of those who opposed his election. His record is clear and untarnished, and we see no reason why the political courtesy of a second term should not be extended to him. It is evident that our state legislature could do much worse than to return Senator Sabin.

He Has Been with the Young Men.

Little Falls Transcript: Senator D. M. Sabin is a candidate for re-election, and if the proper performance of duties and able service to the state are the determining factors in the election he will be his own successor beyond a doubt. He is a man whom the state of Minnesota and the republican party can be proud of as a representative to the senate, and he has certainly earned the endorsement of a re-election.

Popular and Useful.

Baltimore Sun: Senator Sabin is an energetic worker, and although he is not regarded as a brilliant debater, he is a popular and useful member of the senate.

Sabin the Best.

Chicago County News: Between the two, we believe Mr. Sabin to be the truest and best man for the people.

Able and Efficient.

Hubbard Enterprise: Senator Sabin, the present senator, is a candidate for re-election. Sabin has rendered able and efficient service to the state, and is in a position to do more for northwestern interests the next six years than he has in the past.

Not All for Washburn.

Verndale Journal: Some of the Washburn papers have been claiming that the local papers of the state are all for Washburn for senator. It will be necessary for them to revise their statements if they desire to be truthful. Some of the leading weeklies are advocating Sabin strongly.

Secretary Heatwole's Opinion.

Northfield News: We venture the statement that not one-third or even one-fourth of the state are for Washburn, yet everything from Duluth to Leroy, and from Hastings to Ortonville, is claimed for him.

Sabin for the People.

Mankato Free Press: So far as the senatorial question is concerned the Free Press is heartily in favor of the re-election of Senator Sabin. He is acknowledged to be one of the best business men in the senate today, and on all questions of public concern he is in direct line with the more advanced republican ideas. Especially is this true of matters touching upon the welfare of the people of the northwest. His position on the tariff is such as to commend him while his public utterances in the senate on the right of the government to regulate interstate railroad tariffs long before congress took the matter up, proves him to be far-seeing and sound in his views. Senator Sabin is of the people.

Sabin Has the Pole.

Duluth Herald: As the time for the assembling of the legislature approaches the prospect of W. D. Washburn being elected United States senator grows beautifully less. Sabin now has the pole in the race and he will keep it to the finish.

Sabin's Record Unassailable.

Pipestone Star: Mr. Sabin's record in the United States senate on behalf of the people of this great state of Minnesota is unassailable. His only misfortune now, apparently, seems to be that he does not reside in the city of Minneapolis, and it looks at this distance as though this misfortune will follow any man who aspires to the United States senatorship, unless the legislature forcibly demonstrates that St. Paul and Minneapolis are in Minnesota, instead of Minnesota being in St. Paul and Minneapolis.

Sabin Confident.

Duluth Herald: Senator Sabin expresses the greatest confidence in his re-election and it is a noticeable fact that the Washburn men have lost confidence in the success of their candidate since Mr. Sabin has appeared personally in St. Paul.

Sabin Intimate With President Harrison.

Worthington Globe: The Globe is not yet altogether certain whether Senator Sabin ought not to succeed himself. The present senator is an intimate friend of the President-elect, and for this reason he might be able to meet with better success with the affairs of this state. The Globe will investigate the matter more closely in the near future, and will give its views as to who is the best man.

Strong and Influential Worker.

Hutchinson Leader: When Senator Sabin was seated in congress by the legislature of Minnesota the sentiment against him among the people verged upon hatred and he might as well have asked for the moon as an elective office. It is alleged that this feeling has been softened somewhat by his course and record in the senate, where he has been in many respects a strong and influential worker for Minnesota and that the state will not suffer if he is returned to congress.

A Pretty Good Republican.

Little Falls Transcript: Some of the papers of the state are intimating that Senator Sabin is not a good enough republican to represent Minnesota in the senate. He has, since his election, served as chairman of the republican national committee, and that fact ought to establish his standing in the party.

The People Take to Sabin.

Mankato Free Press: Mr. Washburn, in the very nature and circumstances of the case, has no common interests with the people, and never will have, while his leading competitor, Mr. Sabin, has many, and is truly the sort of a man whom the people readily take to. He has shown during a term in the senate that he realizes what is good for the people of Minnesota, all classes thereof, and has intelligently planned for such legislation as will subserve the varied and important interests of the state. Wherever one reason can be assigned for support of Gen. Washburn at least three can be urged in behalf of Senator Sabin.

Sabin as Able as Washburn.

Todd County Argus: The press of the state is not as strongly in favor of Washburn for senator as one would suppose by reading the daily papers of St. Paul and Minneapolis. We are not particularly opposed to Mr. Washburn, but we are unable to see any very great service that he has done this state by which he has earned the senatorship. The present incumbent, Mr. Sabin, stands high in the party and is as able a man as Mr. Washburn.

Sabin in Favor of Tariff Reduction.

Rock County News: While the politicians are laboring faithfully in the interests of W. D. Washburn for United States senator, Senator Sabin is laboring faithfully to secure legislation that will reduce the duty on lumber 50 per cent, and save hundreds of thousands of dollars to the people of Minnesota and the Northwest.

Head of a Great Combine.

Preston National Republican: The National Republican is opposed to confining the political power of the state in St. Paul and Minneapolis, and has urged the claims of Southern Minnesota to recognition. Judge Start is a very worthy and eligible man for the office, but the average politician whose judgment is never inspired by patriotism is opposed to men who think "the office should seek the man." With them politics is of no importance except in a business sense. The barrel governs their judgment and their votes. The humblest farmer can tell whether he casts his ballot wisely by watching the members of the next legislature. We shall discharge a sacred duty by keeping their official conduct before the mirror that reflects their real character.

How any member of the legislature can fairly represent the best interests of the whole state by aiding the election of Mr. Washburn is beyond the power of a just mind to discern. He is the head and front of a great combine of capital that should not be allowed to govern legislation. While not pretending to question his business operations, we object to placing him in an official position where the temptation would be to advance corporate interests to the detriment of public rights.

Faithful and Efficient.

Carver County News: Senator Sabin may congratulate himself upon the bright prospect of his re-election for the United States senate. From all sides words of commendation as to his faithfulness and efficiency are heard, and we doubt not will be affirmed by our state legislators.

Nothing to Gain By a Change.

Little Falls Transcript: The reception which Senator Sabin received on his return to Washington shows that he stands well with his associates, all of whom express a hope that he will be returned to represent Minnesota. Taking this fact in common with the well-known friendship that existed between the coming president and Mr. Sabin when they were in the senate together, and which friendship and mutual esteem continues, goes to show that Minnesota has nothing to gain in influence at the national capital by making a change in senators at the present time.

Sabin Will be Elected.

Kasson Republican: We believe Mr. Sabin is much the best and truest man for the people. His location is more favorable, and his interests are with the people rather than with the railroads. He is a man of good intelligence and great firmness of principles. Between Washburn and Sabin, if we know the temper of the country people and their representatives, Mr. Sabin will be his own successor.

Eminently Fitted.

Wadena Pioneer: Why not have Mr. Sabin succeed himself? There is no reason why it should not be so. Mr. Sabin is a staunch republican; has always worked for the interest of Minnesota and the northwest, and is eminently fitted for the high position. During the six years that Mr. Sabin has occupied a seat in the senate he has served upon many important committees and has made a record of which any man might be proud.

Southern Minnesota in Favor of Sabin.

Winnebago City Press New: The sentiment of Southern Minnesota is daily growing stronger in favor of Senator Sabin's re-election. Minnesota never sent a man to the United States senate who labored more earnestly and effectually for the welfare of the common people than has Senator Sabin. The more his public record is examined into the more apparent does this fact become.

Sabin's Prospects Bright.

Waconia News: Senator Sabin, of Stillwater, is in the field as his own successor, and from a cursory glance over the "field" the prospect for his return looks bright. Mr. Sabin, during this his first term, has acted with wisdom and caution, always with an eye to the advancement of Minnesota's interests.

Hopes Sabin Will Be Elected.

Motley Reporter: It is also well known that the senator enjoys the friendship and the confidence of President-elect Harrison, and that their relations are very close and cordial, having extended through a series of years. These, together with many other considerations, unite in causing us to hope that our legislature will decide to choose Mr. Sabin as his own successor.

Devoted to the Republican Party.

Stillwater Gazette: Of course the Gazette is decidedly in favor of the re-election of Hon. Sabin to the United States senate. He has been a faithful servant to the people, he has introduced measures of reform that are of great importance to the whole country and, as a matter of custom and courtesy we think he is entitled to the endorsement of a second term. No man can be elected from this state who is more devoted to the republican party and the country, and no man from this state stands above Hon. Sabin in securing legislation for his own state.

His Record Particularly Good.

Wadena Pioneer: It is not absolutely necessary that the president of a railroad corporation should be elected United States senator from Minnesota. The farmers do not care to have such a man sent to the senate to look after their interests. Sabin is not connected with any railway corporation and should be elected to succeed himself in the United States senate.

The Reaction Has Already Set In.

Princeton Union: A few days ago it looked as if three-fourths of the state papers were in favor of the election of W. D. Washburn to the senate, but a reaction has set in, and now the Sabin advocates are quite confident.

Intimate With the President-Elect.

Janesville Argus: Senator Sabin's friends point to his remarkable business capacity and to his wholesouled genial sociability that have heretofore been of vast use to him in serving his constituency and in getting their wants and desires to the front at the right time. His personal relations with his associates in the senate are the best and on both sides of the senate chamber are found warm friends. It is said this is particularly the case with Gen. Harrison, who formed a warm companionship with him while his associate in the senate.

Capacity for Getting What He Wants.

Pioneer Press, Dec. 6: Senator Sabin was warmly greeted by his associates when he appeared on the floor of the senate today and assailed with questions as to his chance for re-election, which he parried with the assurance that he was not losing sleep over the matter. A good deal of interest has been exhibited here in the Minnesota senatorial contest mainly on Sabin's account. He is much better known here and in the East generally than any of his opponents, and the desire to see him returned is general, though of course without prejudice to the other candidates. His reputation as an efficient working senator with an exceptional capacity for getting what he wants for his state, his friends and himself, and implies rather more confidence in his reelection here than a careful reading of the Minnesota papers would seem to justify. If the probabilities therein reflected are realized there will be a good deal of disappointment here.

The Stampede to Sabin.

Rushford Star: Public sentiment in this section since the senatorial fight narrowed down to Sabin and Washburn has become considerably Sabinized, and from present indications a stampede of the legislative members to Sabin would meet almost universal approval.

Sabin Steadily Gaining.

Preston Republican: There is a decided increase in the Sabin forces. The opposition to concentrating political power, as would the election of Mr. Washburn, is growing immensely. Men from all parts of the state are becoming alarmed at the possibility that they may be made the political "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for a gigantic combine.

Has Been an Excellent Senator.

Rochester Post: Hon. D. M. Sabin is a candidate for re-election with a fair show of success. He has been an excellent senator and in all the questions pertaining to the control of corporations and the protection of labor his record has been particularly good and in accord with the popular sentiment of the state. He has well represented the mass of the people.

All Right on the Tariff.

Minneapolis Tribune: Senator Sabin today offered an amendment to the tariff bill reducing the duty on lumber 50 per cent or rather from $2 to $1 per thousand feet. The impression prevails that the amendment will pass the senate and house both. Sabin's amendment is in harmony with republican sentiment as expressed in the tariff debate last summer. There is hardly a democrat who will oppose the amendment, yet it may meet with opposition from the delegation from Maine, who want the highest possible tariff on the article.

Sabin the Winner.

Stillwater Gazette: As the hour approaches for the election of a United States senator it will become more and more apparent that Senator Sabin is the winning candidate, notwithstanding the fact that the republican newspapers of St. Paul and Minneapolis are doing their level best to elect Washburn.

Let the Country Districts be Heard.

St. Charles Union: The newspapers of Minneapolis and St. Paul talk as if the Twin cities and a radius of a few miles around them had an indefeasible right to claim all the United States senators to which the great state of Minnesota is entitled. They ignore all other parts of the state completely, and know only Washburn and Sabin. We wish to gently remind them that there is such a part of the state as southern Minnesota, which is justly entitled, by population and republican vote, to representation in the upper house of congress. We admit that if we had no senatorial timber, the matter would not be worth wrangling over; but there are a number of eminent citizens residing within the limits specified, any one of whom is abundantly qualified to represent the whole state—and don't you forget it? Their names are not unfamiliar to the people.

The Twin Gluttons Roasted.

Duluth News: What we do ask is a senator who shall be a representative of the whole state, and though we could easily furnish some good timber, we press the names of no one from Duluth. It is, in fact, because a desperate effort has been made to secure undue representation for one section, a section peculiarly grasping, that we have been moved to such strenuous opposition. The proposition is monstrous that of Minnesota's two senators one should come from St. Paul and one from Minneapolis, leaving four-fifths of the state without representation in the upper branch of congress. These two cities have their local rivalries, but they are united for the purpose of local aggrandizement at the expense of the state. There is much legislation to come before congress which will bear directly upon these interests. Let the farmers choose a man of or near themselves and Duluth will be satisfied. A lawyer of Alexandria, a lumberman of Stillwater, a judge of Rochester, or any of half a dozen others would serve our interests. But a Minneapolis railroad president who thinks that water should be made to run up hill to reach the Flour City, and that everything should be turned and twisted against nature and all reason, if necessary, to build up Minneapolis—such a man is no fit representative for the state of Minnesota.

Don't Want a Political Dynasty.

Albert Lea Enterprise: The politicians are grooming Washburn, of Minneapolis, for United States senator. There are already too many millionaires in the senate sent there by republican legislatures, and Minnesota should not follow suit by the election of another. Some honest and brainy man in whom the people have confidence, outside of Minneapolis and St. Paul, ought to be elected.

Mr. Washburn's Location Rules Him out.

Kasson Republican: While we have nothing to say against Mr. Washburn, personally, we do not like his location. While it is conceded that the Twin cities will give him a united strong support, it is a manifest fact that his election will not be for the benefit of the state at large and members from the country and country towns will and should oppose him on point of location as well as on account of his railroad interests. The prosperity and interests of the roads have sapped the life from the rural districts, and depreciated the price of farms and farm property throughout the Northwest; while railroad magnates have accumulated millions at the expense of the farmers, the roads have and do discriminate in favor of terminal points. Mr. Washburn's interests are in favor of the great terminal point of Minneapolis, as well as his large monetary interest in the roads. A man will not work against his own interests, and his own interests are inimical to those of the rural districts.

A Farmer's View.

Dawson Sentinel: I have been a resident of Minnesota for 30 years and have been somewhat familiar with its prominent men, and I can recall no instance where Gen. Washburn has ever made either personal or pecuniary sacrifice for the good of the state. When dollars cease their flow to his coffers he ceases to know aught but self.

Played It Fine.

Fisher Bulletin: The Minneapolis and St. Paul papers are still claiming the earth for Washburn. Last Saturday's Minneapolis Journal contained about 50 extracts from country papers, most of whom favored Washburn's candidacy. Then it goes on to say editorially that this is the sentiment of the country press and says: "The Journal has always found the editors of the country press good authority on the prevailing sentiment on important questions in their respective localities, and has undertaken to sound them on the senatorial question as a means of getting at the preferences of the people of the state on this matter. The replies of about 50 editors scattered all over the state are published today." Now the facts of the matter are that the Journal sent out to those papers who were known to be out and out Washburn men or anti-Sabin men, a circular letter asking them their preference for United States senator, but they took good care, however, not to send a circular to avowed Sabin men, if they had the result would have been very much different. But wait and we shall see what we shall see.

Washburn's Statesmanship.

Windom Reporter: Under the specious cry of "statesmanship" Gen. Washburn's vulnerable points are being evaded and covered up in the mad race of the capitalists of the cities to force upon the state a thorough railroad man. There are two sides to the senatorial issue, and the people's side is seldom heard, while Washburn's is sounded from one end of the state to the other. We have no word of fault to find with Washburn as a citizen or an individual, but as a legislator, in times when the greatest interests of the people are being fought in a contest where his personal interest is not in harmony with the demands of the people, we are afraid to trust him. Perhaps the people want a railroad president, but we believe when they come to consider his great financial interests in common with Sabin's well known record as a senator in congress, they will hesitate before consenting that their representatives and senators in the legislature shall vote for Washburn.

Favorable Advices.

St. Paul Globe: Senator Buckman, the first and foremost of Mr. Sabin's supporters, regards the latter's re-election as almost a certainty. The advices from all sections of the state are most favorable, indicating that a large proportion of the legislative members have a feeling that there is no valid reason for refusing the honor to the present incumbent. If there is to be a caucus, the Sabin men propose to labor for fair play, an open contest and a rigid adherence to the decision reached. If there is no caucus they will unite themselves in the Old Guard style and go up or down with flying colors. The report originating with the Washburn faction that Senator Sabin wields no influence with the incoming administration is not paid attention to, since it is not considered a vital question to the people of the state whether their senator is a personal or a political friend of Ben Harrison. On the side, though, it is known beyond question that President Harrison bears Senator Sabin very high respect, and in Northwestern matters considers him to be an able authority.

Cheap Enough.

Mankato Free Press: Donnelly believes that Washburn will develop his entire strength for senator on the first ballot, which will not exceed 35 votes. This being the case we cannot see why Mr. Sabin's chances for re-election are not as bright as could possibly be hoped for. Senator Sabin, in an interview with a Globe reporter, has the following in regard to a couple of Washburn's organs:

"A friend sends me this clipping from the Spring Valley Vidette, a paper down in Fillmore county." And this is the way it reads:

Davis and Washburn! Two grand men. Won't they shine in the United States senate! Let Fillmore county lead the Washburn column in its grand march to victory!

"That paper is edited," said the senator," by a man named Van Leuven. He wrote me recently from Fillmore county and asking me to send him some money. Of course I paid no attention to his letter, but he has apparently written other letters which were more successful, and he now wants 'to lead the Washburn column.'

PLEDGING THE FIVE VOTES

"Mitchell, of the Duluth Tribune, is another case of 'practical conversion,' and I see his utterances are being quoted against me. But I am content with the cordial and unbought support I am receiving, and do not believe opinion or advice to the members of the legislature otherwise secured has any weight."

An Unfair Press.

Northfield News: Because the republican papers of St. Paul and Minneapolis have almost entire excluded from their columns all reference to any senatorial candidate except Mr. Washburn some people have been led to believe that the contest is a sort of jug-handle affair. Not a paper in the two cities, not one, fairly represents the exact majority sentiment in the state. It seems strange that some papers dare not lift their voices against insolent railway corporations, or justly and reasonably criticise a railway magnate. The metropolitan papers should, in a certain sense, be the moulders of public opinion, and it should be done in an independent and fair manner. Why have these papers taken up so unanimously the cause of one man? The people can answer this question without much thought. The fair way has hardly been found by our city friends. We venture the statement that not one-third or even one-fourth of the papers in the state are for Mr. Washburn, yet everything from Duluth to LeRoy and from Hastings to Ortonville is claimed for him. It is very true that these papers not for Mr. Washburn are not all united in the support of any one man; but they are honestly and firmly opposed to the creation of a political dynasty in Minneapolis, or if you please, the dual cities. These cities have for years in a commercial way sapped the life blood from the country districts and are preparing to do the same thing politically. To fortify ourselves in the statement that the senatorial contest is not one-sided, we print in the News today a few extracts from papers published in different parts of the state and invite a careful reading. It may be that the city papers do not print these because they fear hidden power or punishment. The people of the rural districts should remember that they have it in their power to elect one of their own number; and they certainly will make a mistake if a man unfriendly to their interests is chosen.

A Man with Interests of the People.

Winnebago City Press: While a great effort is being made at present to give Mr. Washburn a newspaper boom, it is extremely doubtful if he can be elected to the United States senate by such means. In fact it looks already as if the boom had spent its force and a reaction had set in. If we understand correctly the wishes of a majority of the farmers of this section they are not, by any means, longing for a railroad president to be placed in a position where he can make laws to suit his own and other railroad corporations. But on the contrary, a man is wanted who will favor and vote for measures in the interest of the people rather than corporations. A public servant must be judged by his official acts, they being the main thing in which his constituents are concerned. In this connection it may not be amiss to state that during his six years in the United States senate every measure in favor of the people has received the support and vote of Senator Sabin; and for this reason those now actively engaged in decrying him, dare not attack his official record. We believe, notwithstanding the clamor, that Senator Sabin will succeed himself. At least in all fairness he ought to. As a personal friend of President Harrison, he will have additional influence with the incoming administration—in fact, it is conceded he will have more prestige than any other man in the state—and it must be apparent that with such a state of affairs existing, the people of Minnesota would receive far greater benefits in the re-election of Senator Sabin than from any opponent in the field against him.

THE TWO RECORDS.

Washburn's and Sabin's Views With Regard to Railway Management Contrasted.

Report of the "Soo" Road to the Railroad Commission.

The jealousy with which the farmers of Minnesota regard the attempt of the Twin cities to grasp and control all the power of legislation is justified by the action of these twin centers of commerce and capital in forcing the election to the senate of the United States of a man whose only claim to distinction lies in his successful establishment of a wheat ring with its questionable system of weights, measures and grades, manipulated to increase the profits of the millers at the expense of the farmers' grain bins, and in his frantic efforts to mortise railroad tracks into the Minneapolis Hub like the spokes of a wheel projected regardless of any proper supporting felloes,—roads that are delared by the well-informed Minneapolis writer of "an open letter" to be "a hindrance to the growth and development of the city and state." The capitalists of both St. Paul and Minneapolis have been drawn into the railroad schemes of Mr. Washburn, especially into the Soo road, and are interested in having such legislation in congress as will aid this speculative enterprise. And to aid this, the competing railroad system of Canada connected with Canadian sea ports must be favored as against the cheap water route from Duluth or the old established route by way of Chicago to New York and Boston. To aid in the election of Mr. Washburn all of the newspapers of the Twin cities have been whipped into line, and many country papers at first thoughtlessly echoed the interested praise of the city press, and soon indulged in such extravagant, fulsome laudation of Mr. Washburn as to put members of the legislature and others upon their inquiry, and with the result of showing that Mr. W. D. Washburn is the kind of a man that the farmers of Minnesota will not consent to put into the United States senate as their representative. And whoever in the state senate or house casts a vote for him may expect to receive the unqualified condemnation of any and every granger constituency.

A statement of a single matter which in regular course will not be published for a month or two, but which is in the hands of the public printer now, will prove an antidote to all the misleading and deceptive statements that have been so industriously circulated in all parts of the state for the past six months. The Ortonville Herald-Star of Nov. 29, 1888, contains a fair example of literature served up to forestall public opinion and secure the votes of country members. The editor, or whoever wrote the article, declares that "Mr. Washburn's immense business interests dragged him away from politics. It was a question with him whether he could serve his state better at home than in Washington."

The writer would have more truthfully represented the matter if he had said the question with him was whether he could serve his own estate better at home than in Washington, but the writer in the Evening Star, is not satisfied with mild-mannered praise. He says: "His handiwork is traceable throughout the length and breath of the state." "He built the Minneapolis & St. Louis railway, the celebrated Soo railway, and the Minneapolis & Pacific railway, and every one of these lines was built with one purpose in view—that of adding to the grandeur, glory and commercial wealth of the state." All for the grandeur, glory and commercial wealth of this state!

In contrast to his high sounding verbosity, let us take a page from the report of the commissioners of railroads for the state of Minnesota, now in the hands of the public printer, and when the editor of the Ortonville Star reads and reflects upon the official statement made by the president of the Soo road, his apology to his granger and commercial patrons should be ample and characterized by the distressful abasement of a loud-voiced hound when he finds he has been barking up the wrong tree.

*This includes discount upon income certificates sold at a low price, and should not, in the opinion of the commission, be taken as a part of the cost of the road. A full explanation of this will be found in the annual report of the commissioner, now being printed.

By this statement it appears that the total cost of 787 miles of railroad was reported to be in round numbers $37,000,000, and that one item is charged to construction account as discount and interest, which on examination, turn out to be $17,000,000 income certificates. Elsewhere it appears that these were taken by W. D. Washburn & Co., at 188 mills on the dollar; which is to say, this road cost (unless there are other hidden interest and discounts), $22,000,000 to the stockholders, but to the farmers and others of necessity using this road, it cost $15,000,000 more, which went into the pockets of W. D. Washburn & Co., all for the "grandeur, glory, and commercial wealth of this state?" not by any means, but of W. D. Washburn & Co., who by this action propose to exact tolls sufficient to pay 6 or more per cent on the reputed cost of the road; and if they collect it, $900,000 annually will be contributed to this "one man's progressiveness and enterprise" as the Ortonville editor puts it. He who makes two blades of grass to grow where one grew before it, is said, may be called a benefactor to the race; but what appropriate name shall we give him who makes $900,000 a year grow out of the arid soil of the Sault Ste. Marie railroad charter? And what representative of the farmers of Minnesota will dare vote to send this "progressive" and "magnetic" man, as a representative of this state to the United States senate?

Remarks of Senator Sabin on the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Bill.

JOURNAL UNITED STATES SENATE, April 8, 1886.—"If the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway company will be prevented from building this 240 miles of railroad by the adoption of an amendment which simply imposes upon them the condition of building an honest railway, one that shall be bonded and stocked so that the interest on the bonds and stock of the corporation shall be paid from the earnings of the railway, which earnings are secured to that road by the freight and traffic that are given it by the overtaxed and languishing agricultural interests of this country it is certainly a link not worth building. Our farmers are compelled to sell their wheat for 50 to 60 cents a bushel. Our industries are oppressed with overtaxed burdens, one of the most potent reasons for which is the large amount paid for transportation of their products to market, by corporations requiring excessive and arbitrary charges to pay dividends and interest on properties, the bonded and watered stocks of which aggregate from two to four times the actual cost of the property. * * * I think that the great trouble which is agitating the whole land today and causing honest and thoughtful men to pause and consider the questions of our labor, and our labor strikes would have assumed much less threatening proportions, if indeed not been entirely averted, if the railroads on which these strikes have occurred were stocked and bonded for any reasonable amount of their cost. * * * Corporations having reasonable dividends on a fair and honest construction account instead of attempting to pay them on a large amount of fictitious and watered capitalization, would then be in condition to pay reasonable and living wages to that class of our fellow citizens who are furnishing the bone and sinew of our land and earning their daily bread by the sweat of their brows.

For these reasons I shall vote for this amendment and every other of like purport that is presented.

The amendment was—The whole amount of bonds outstanding at any one time shall not exceed one half of the actual cost of construction and equipment of the road.

Leave Out the Twin Cities.

Winona Republican: There is more of non-committalism on the senatorial question among the members of the coming legislature than has perhaps ever been known before on a similar occasion. The almost universal reply of the legislators when questioned on the subject is that there is such an abundance of good senatorial timber in the field that the choice of a candidate at this early date is almost, if not quite, impossible as well as being unnecessary. Not only do they thus decline to state publicly their preferences, but the leaders of the opposing factions profess to find it very hard to obtain private pledges. This reticence may be regarded as an indirect endorsement of the growing hostility to giving both the senators to the Twin cities.

Good Advice to the State Press.

Lac Qui Parle Press: From the way the papers of the country are booming W. D. Washburn for the United States senate, we are afraid they will boom him through without much regard as to whether there are better or more capable men to be found in the state or not. In our opinion Wakefield or Nelson, or Lind or Donnelly, any of them, come nearer the mark of being a statesman than does Mr. Washburn, who, though a capable and enterprising business man cannot possibly be classed among statesmen. The country newspapers ought not to lose their heads in this matter. It isn't always conducive to the best interests of the state for us to get to soaring away up among the clouds over the candidacy of any man and we would advise the fraternity to come back to earth.

The Animus of the Corporation Newspapers.

Winnebago City Press-News: It is evident that the unfairness with which Senator Sabin has been treated by the big corporation newspapers was not a move, by any means, in the interest of the people, particularly at this time when the farmers view with alarm the probable formation at an early day of a gigantic railway trust in this country.

The People of the State Aroused.

Duluth News: We have no candidate to press. If Nelson was in the field the News would be found foremost in his support. But it seems more likely that the southern part of the state will name the candidate and it is fitting that the people here should leave them to the selection. If it is to be Sabin, we cheerfully acquiesce. If Windom, who is not so dead as some think, and others would like to have it appear, we shall be content. If the erratic, brilliant sage of Ninlnger, demagogic, yet faithful to the people's interests as he conceives them, our assent will be given. If some newer man, like Start of Rochester, whom we know and respect, our approbation will be given to the choice. Our insistence is this that the senator from Minnesota must be a man to represent the whole stae, and that in general terms he should not be chosen from the Twin cities. This notion we should incline to, whoever was the favorite put forward by Minneapolis. The people, not alone in the Fifth district, are aroused to the necessity of choosing some one who does not represent one city alone.

Some Oppose Twin City Bossism.

Mankato Free Press: The statement is being quite industriously circulated that the Free Press is the only paper in the state that is supporting the re-election of Senator Sabin, while all the remainder of editorial sentiment is directed as an avalanche in favor of Gen. Washburn. While we are not at all averse to be so classed, it is unfair to a large number of the most able or influential newspapers in the southern part of the state to say they are included in the alleged "tidal wave" which is "sweeping every county." Among many journals whose aggregate influence is not to be sneezed at, the Winona Republican, Rochester Post, Windom Reporter, Fairmont News, Northfield News, Albert Lea Enterprise, Kasson Republican and Owatonna Journal, are enrolled against Wasburn. These papers are not, to be sure, distinctly supporting Senator Sabin, but they are disposed to show him fair play, and do not attempt to depreciate his abilities or service to the state. They are, however, strongly opposed to Gen. Washburn, which indicates that the "popular wave in the southern part of the state," we hear so much about, is a very feeble ripple.

The Sable Steed From the Country.

Herman Enterprise: We predict that neither Washburn or Sabin will have a walkaway in the contest for senator. Both are men of great ability, but it seems to us as though the country was entitled to the office, and there are men outside of the cities who are capable of filling the office.

FARMERS TAKING A HAND.

Washburn Claims Untrue—Fitz John Porter and Lamar.

Winona Republican: The stupendous efforts of Minneapolis and Washburn to elect him to the senate is certainly not very well received here. The report that all of our delegation are pledged to Washburn is untrue, as far as four of them are concerned. Why the Washburn boomers persist in trying to make it appear to be a fight between Washburn and Sabin is not explained by the Washburn men, but the effort on their part is fast bringing the entire field against Washburn.

Why Mr. Sabin's record is attacked by them is still more strange. One Washburn paper charges Sabin with shamming sickness to beat Windom—a charge too silly to be denied.

The next charge that he voted to reinstate Fitz John Porter is more serious. I think it required better testimony than rebel brigadiers to impeach the court martial and witnesses that tried him, and to reverse the approval of that finding by Abraham Lincoln. Other republicans, including Gen. Grant, thought differently, and I for one am above condemning a man for letting mercy season his opinions. Another charge, not well sustained, is, that he was paired favorably on the confirmation of Justice Lamar. I believe this was all wrong, but I do not believe there is anything in it so far as relates to Sabin. Many other republican senators failed to vote against Lamar without being brought to account, and as there was no need of this pairing on Mr. Sabin's part. I do not believe so astute a politician as he is would have been so foolish.

If I were disposed to revive all the old charges that have from time to time been made against Mr. Washburn, some of them in his own home papers, and you, Mr. Editor, would print them in the The Republican, it would be an easy task to make out a very much stronger case against him than any that his supporters attempt to make against Mr. Sabin. But let that pass. It is enough to say that Mr. Washburn is not the man for Minnesota to send to the senate at this juncture. He is the most objectionable to the people of all the candidates—and the field against him is not amiss. A senator who represents the state will make the Twin cities equally prosperous with us, but to legislate for them against us is crushing.

Rushford, Dec. 21, 1888.

FARMER.

Washburn Cannot Be Elected.

Fairmont News: The enemies of Senator Sabin are making a great deal of blow and bluster over what they claim to be the fact, that a majority of the press of the state of Minnesota is opposed to that gentleman. The Pioneer Press easily sets the fashion for the journalists of this state. The Pioneer Press came out against Mr. Sabin for some reason known only to the inner workings of that concern and a great many other newspapers followed its lead more because it was the fashion than because they wanted to. The Pioneer Press did the same thing for Judge Gresham, following in that case the lead of the Chicago Tribune and the country papers in this state as well as elsewhere took it up quite generally, and we all remember how the babies on the prairies were even crying for Walter Q. The convention met in Chicago and the chances of Judge Gresham for the nomination for the presidency were just about as good as were those of the city editor of the Pioneer Press, all of which goes to show that the public press of Minnesota does not mould public opinion nor control the legislature. "Paul may plant and Apollo's water," the St. Paul Pioneer Press may take snuff and the Dispatch and Minneapolis Tribune sneeze but W. D. Washburn will not be the next United States senator from the state of Minnesota. If Mr. Sabin is not elected to succeed himself you can put it in your pipe, gentlemen and smoke it at your leisure, that Mr. Washburn will not be. Ignatius Donnelly may be a "Daysie" but he made a statement once on a time in congress, to euphemize slightly, that all the Washburn family were born with M. C. on them, but none of them had been big enough to contain the three letters, U. S. S. and we are inclined to the opinion that if Donnelly was not a success as a politician he was something of a prophet.

Washburn Forces Not So Gay.

Little Falls Transcript: The Washburn forces have abandoned the gay and jolly style that characterized them for a few days after the artificial boom had been merrily started in St. Paul and Minneapolis papers and in the country papers that could be induced to print a portrait and "The Record of a Busy Life." "It was then announced that Washburn was the choice of nearly every man, woman and child in the state, and that any talk of opposition to his election was nonsense and entirely out of place. The men who organized this move expressed surprise that any man could have such a hold on the hearts of the people as did Washburn. But they have changed now. They find scarcely a locality outside of Minneapolis that is showing any interest in their candidate's success. The agreed and contracted publications have been made in country papers, and no increase in legislative votes for Washburn is yet discernible. No one has been frightened by the howl that has gone up from the Twin cities, and the outside territory is as determined as ever that St. Paul and Minneapolis shall not monopolize the state's representatives in the upper house of congress. The Washburn managers realize this, and the tone of the city papers shows that confidence has turned to doubt. It was pleasant to claim everything, but the reaction has been a little tough on the boomers. The demonstration failed to scare any of the other candidates, and Sabin and his friends are on deck for the fight, with every chance of success. His friends are not claiming that every member of both houses favor him, but they have good reason for confidence in the fight. The Sabin campaign is not so much on the brass band order, but as against Washburn it has the sympathy of an overwhelming majority of the people outside of the Twin cities.

The Sabin Boom.

St. Paul Globe, 26th: Communications are pouring into the Sabin headquarters at the Merchants from all parts of the state, and the following from a correspondent at Mantorville, Dodge county, is a fair sample of the tone of public opinion: "Senator Sabin is the choice of the voters of this county by a large majority. This is the unanimous sentiment, not only of republicans but democrats as well, and is based not upon hearing, but on interviews with a number of representative men of both parties in each town in the county. Our senators and representatives are men who will voice the wishes of their constituents, and when it comes to the final pinch Dodge county's two votes will be cast for Dodge county's choice, D. M. Sabin."

Does Not Pretend to Say.

Fairmont News: A few of the reasons why the News looks favorably upon the re-election of Senator Sabin are these: First, he has had one term and a man of the ability of Mr. Sabin must have learned much in that time in the United States senate, and hence would be of infinitely more advantage to his constituents than a new member could possibly be, no matter how brilliant. Again, Mr. Sabin has a remarkable faculty of approaching men, winning their confidence, earning their esteem, binding them closely to him and in these respects it is doubtful if he has his peer in Minnesota, and his rare social qualities go for a great deal in Washington, much further than many people suppose. We do not pretend to say that Mr. Sabin is all the man in Minnesota who is fit for a United States senator, but at the present writing it appears that he is not only the most available but that he is the best man for the interests of the state.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE BILL.

Gen. Washburn's Interests Opposed to It—He Cannot Be Depended Upon to Improve It.

Windom Reporter: The transportation and tariff questions are the most vital ones before congress so far as the West is concerned, in a business point of view. The interstate law and its underlying principle, government control of railroads, are in their infancy yet, and it can hardly be just to the intelligence of Gen. Washburn to maintain that if elected senator he will support a measure and assist in its passage which is a direct curtailment of railroad interests, in which Gen. Washburn's great fortune and the fortunes of his eastern friends interested in railroad development are involved. The interstate law is yet defective and needs improvement and perfection in the direction of bringing the railroads into subjection to the will of the people, and great as our confidence is in Gen. Washburn's wealth, probity of character, etc., we do not believe he can be depended on to assist in the perfection of the interstate law in the interests of the people. That must be done by the friends of the people, and not by the men who have the many millions of their own fortunes as well as the many millions of other people's fortunes at heart.

It matters little to us who is United States senator so long as a man with interests in common with the people is elected. But such is not Gen. Washburn. His interests are not those of the people, but those of the Vanderbilts, the Goulds, and the lesser lights of railroad fame. If the people want that kind of a senator they may take him. That Washburn built the "Soo" road and that it is a great equalizer of rates, etc., is not an argument in his favor. However great a boon it may temporarily be, when it becomes too serious a competitor for any of the Chicago lines and they want to buy it, Gen. Washburn's great business foresight will induce him to pool.

Do Not Be Unfair About It.

Duluth Daily News: This isn't a good year for the Twin cities to try to dominate state politics. It isn't a good year either for W. D. Washburn to run for the senate. Let the people of the state sink minor differences and determine only to select some one who will represent all interests fairly, as Washburn would not, and whose personal ends will not be supreme, as Washburn's unquestionably would be.

Action of the Evart County Alliance.

We protest against the election of any man to the United States senate who is unfriendly to the interstate commerce law, and especially demand that the fourth section and anti-pooling clause be kept intact.

If the laws enacted, prohibiting the fraudulent issue of stocks, is insufficient, we ask the legislature to enact laws with penalties sufficient to prevent this great evil.

A Roast for a Railroad President.

Glencoe Enterprise: The senatorial fight is becoming interesting. There are plenty of candidates willing to accept the office, but in our opinion some of them are not the right kind of timber to represent the great state of Minnesota in the United States senate.

CARNEGIE'S OIL BONANZA.

Ten Million Dollars From the Story Farm in 27 Years.

TITUSVILLE, Pa., Dec. 31.—It is an interesting fact not generally known that Mr. Andrew Carnegie, the big iron manufacturer, whose income was the subject of so much newspaper comment during the campaign, made his first big money in the oil business. The death, in Pittsburg, of D. A. Stewart, chairman of Carnegie Bros. & Co., suggests a reference to the Columbia Oil company, of which Mr. Stewart was treasurer and the active manager, and Mr. Carnegie one of the several stockholders. This company bought and operated the Story farm, in Oil Creek, between Titusville and Oil City, a history of which reads like a story of the Arabian Nights. It was the richest farm ever developed in the oil country, and from his interest in this farm Mr. Carnegie became comparatively a rich man. The farm was originally owned by William Story, who barely made a living on it prior to the discovery of petroleum. It consisted of 400 acres, and Mr. Story offered the place for $4,500, one-third of which was to be cash and the balance in three annual payments. He could find no purchaser until oil was struck on the creek and then he sold it to Mr. Carnegie and his friends for $35,000 cash. The Columbia Oil company was organized to develop it, May 1, 1861. Mr. Stewart was made treasurer and Mr. Carnegie one of its directors. The capital stock was $250,000, divided into 10,000 shares of $25 each. The farm proved to be productive beyond all expectation, and in the entire history of the petroleum industry no other farm has approached it as an oil bonanza. Its first year's output was 20,600 barrels and the following year it was increased to 89,600. In two and a half years after the incorporation of the company dividends had been declared amounting to 130 per cent on the capital stock. In 1864 the production of the farm increased to 141,508 barrels. During this year the average price of oil was $9.87½ per barrel. During the first six months of this year four dividends were declared amounting to 160 per cent on the capital stock. A month later the capital was increased to $2,500,000 and a dividend of 5 per cent on this amount was at once declared from the earnings of the farm. Before the close of the year five dividends were declared, making in all 25 per cent on the increased stock. Ten years after the first well was struck on the property the production of the farm was 142,034 barrels for that year. In these 10 years 1,715,973 barrels were produced and the whole amount of its dividends was 401 per cent on its capital stock. In a lawsuit in Erie, in 1865, Mr. Stewart, treasurer of the company testified that the Columbia Oil company had sold oil from the farm to the value of between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000. Estimating the amount of oil produced by the farm since that time, the total output is placed by practical oil men between $9,000,000 and $10,000,000. Although the Story farm has been constantly operated for 27 years, it is still producing about one hundred barrels per month. All the old, original wells have been drained and abandoned some years ago, and the present production is from new wells drilled within the past few years. Hundred of farms in the oil region have yielded vast fortunes to their owners, but none of them have a record equal to this, and from this farm Mr. Carnegie received a start that has made him one of the money princes of the world.

THE FASHION IN MEN.

New York World: Fashion has decreed that light haired men shall be the rage this year. The result is that many dudes are bleaching their dark moustaches. If they can make their hair as light as their mental equipment they will look exceedingly stylish.

IS TASCOTT DEAD?

Many Chicago Detectives Believe That the Snell Murderer Is No More.

Possibility that the Body Found in the River Below St. Paul Was Tascott's.

Impossibility for the Criminal to Hide in Any Quarter of the World.

Chicago detectives are beginning to believe that young Tascott, the burglar who murdered Mr. Snell, must be dead, because he would certainly have been captured before this if alive. Circulars offering $50,000 reward have been sent all over the globe, yet no one has come forward who has seen him.

CHICAGO, Dec. 27.—William B. Tascott, the murderer of Mr. Snell, is dead—at least that is the deliberate opinion of some of the most skillful detectives in Chicago. They say that beyond a doubt the Snell family might just as well increase the $50,000 reward now offered for the young man to one of a million dollars. It will never be paid.

"What makes you think he is dead?" asked the reporter of the local superintendent of a well-known detective agency.

"Because unquestionably if he were alive he would have been caught long ago," was the reply. "In the whole history of crime there never was such a hunt made for a man. To begin with, the reward offered for his arrest is very much the biggest ever offered for any criminal. That alone would probably have secured his capture if he were not in his grave. Then think of the way his description has been scattered over the civilized world. There isn't a postoffice in the United States where his appearance is not as well known as it is here in Chicago—there is hardly such a postoffice in the wide world. The circulars offering the enormous rewards have been translated into every European language and sent around the globe. How Tascott looks and what he is wanted for are known in Paris and Borneo, in Vienna and Melbourne. Even the islanders in the Pacific Ocean have heard of him. There are spots he might hide in where he would be safe, like Kamtchatka or some place of that sort, but it would be impossible for him to reach any such place without being seen on the way by hundreds of people who would afterwards remember him from the descriptions in the reward circulars, even if they did not recognize him at first.

"One police official has been quoted as saying that he thinks the murderer is hiding in the dense swamps or sloughs along the Mississippi river on the borders of Wisconsin. That would be a good place to hide in, but he could not stay hidden there all this time without somebody discovering him. It is simply impossible. This, too, brings up another point. If he is alive, how does he live? All he got from Mr. Snell's safe would not support him two weeks. If his father or another person here sent him money, that fact would be almost immediately discovered. He could not ply his old trade of thief without associating with the criminals watched by the police, without being betrayed by some one of those he would have to work with, or without being captured as a burglar long ago. As to manual labor, he knew no honest occupation except running an elevator. He could not work without being employed by some one else, and how could he do that anywhere without discovery? At every hamlet and crossroads he would be recognized. It has been suggested that some woman or criminal friend in a big city is keeping him in concealment. Tascott was of such a restless, uneasy nature that it would be impossible for him to remain concealed as long as this. Some trace of him would surely be found."

"Couldn't he have gone abroad? Sergeant Hubbard has been reported as thinking he has slipped across the ocean."

"I don't see how he could get abroad without leaving a trail which the extraordinary search that has been made would surely find."

Other detectives also supported the idea that Tascott was dead. One of them said: "This is my theory: Inspector Bonfield's men positively traced Tascott to St. Paul. There they lost him, though they brought back indisputable evidence that he had been in the city. About a month after the murder, a body was found under the ice some distance below St. Paul, which was said to resemble Tascott. I never heard that the matter was closely investigated. In my judgment, if that was not the body of Tascott, he died about that time and in about that way. I think Tascott committed the murder on a sudden impulse. It was the first time he had shed blood and he was dazed and half-crazed by his crime. He hung about Chicago until he saw that the hunt was getting close to his trail, which was two or three days before he was positively identified as the murderer. Then he fled to St. Paul. While he was there the full identification came out and he killed himself. It may be argued that he was not the kind of a man to commit suicide. If he had been, an ordinary old and hardened criminal, that would be true; but Tascott was young. This was his first great crime. He was just the man to make away with himself under the circumstances. Of course, Inspector Bonfield, who has done so much hard work on the case, does not like to own up beaten. Eventually he will have to come to this conclusion."

There is an intimate friend of Col. Tascott's who was his advisor when his son was first charged with the murder. This friend was suspected by the police of having young Tascott concealed in his house or his office. For this reason he was for a long time carefully shadowed by detectives. He said to a friend one day: "I am being dogged by detectives, who think I have young Tascott hidden somewhere. I haven't, but I can assure you positively that the young man will never be caught in this world," from which it is inferred that he knew Tascott was dead.

The man who made this remark is a reputable citizen who stood in a delicate and confidential position towards the elder Tascott. It would be manifestly unjust to give his name.

Neither Inspector Bonfield nor Supt. Hubbard, any more than A. J. Stone, Mr. Snell's son-in-law, will admit a belief that Tascott is dead. They still cherish hopes that he will be caught some day. Nevertheless, they do not assert that the prospect is any brighter than it was six months ago. The search has now been going on 10 months. It has cost in the neighborhood of $16,000 for printing and postage alone. As an evidence of the keen interest that is taken in it all over the world, it may be mentioned that Inspector Bonfield receives every day a pile of letters about Tascott half as high as his desk. Supt. Hubbard and Mr. Stone are also deluged with correspondence. It is no exaggeration to say that there are many thousand men scattered over the globe who are keeping a keen watch for "a slender young man with gold filling in his teeth," etc. Increasing the reward has increased their number and their vigilance.

And still there is no Tascott.

Johnson, Berger & Co., grocers, of Sioux City, failed.

BOB GETS A BERTH.

Ex-Secretary Robert Miller, of Minnesota, Gets a Government Office.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 29.—Rasmus K. Doe has been appointed government gauger at St. Paul, Minn.

Mr. Doe is a resident of Minneapolis. At the St. Paul custom house it was learned that Robert Miller had also been appointed government gauger at that place, and E. K. Heimbach and John Stahl government storekeepers.

DANTE'S DIVINE COMEDY.

Four years ago, there came from the press of Houghton & Mifflin, a translation of the complete works of Virgil in two elegant volumes, prefaced by an admirable prose essay entitled "The Virgilians." From the same publishers now appear two companion volumes—"Dante's Divine Comedy in English Verse."

The author of these translations is Mr. John Augustine Wilstach, a gentleman whom profound scholarship and poetic insight well equip for such an undertaking. Having chosen for the rendition of Virgil's hexameters that heroic verse which best conveys their meaning, he now reproduces Dante's triple rhyme in a nine-line stanza which aims at truth to the original form and text.

To Dante it was given to break the long poetic silence of twelve centuries, to take up the lyre laid down by Virgil in the first century and describe an allegorical pilgrimage through hell and purgatory with the great Mantuan bard as guide and mentor—a pilgrimage ending with Virgil at the threshold of paradise, which as unbaptised pagan he was forbidden to enter. In this world-wide poem, heathen and Christian alike find place; here mingle the dead and the living from all classes and generations of men—and yet it is mainly a picture of Dante's era, the thirteenth century.

The father of Italian as well as of Christian poetry, Dante gave form and vitality to his native language, his being the first work written in perfect Italian. It were vain to seek to number the poets who have drawn their best inspiration from this mediæval singer, and of whom Tasso, Spenser and Milton are shining examples.

Read formerly but by the learned few, Dante is now becoming familiar to the educated many. As the world advances in culture, the more will it seek refreshment at this fountain head of modern poetry.

"Dante's painting," says Carlyle, "has the vividness of fire in a dark night. It is a thing woven out of rainbows from a background of eternal black." The most picturesque of poets, his divine comedy is a series of pictures, to which Michael Angelo and Raphael gave form upon canvas—from which were drawn the demons, angels and madonnas of the renaissance.

The spokesman and painter of an age just emerging from barbarism, an age when the western hemisphere was undiscovered, when printing had not been invented, when true science was as yet unborn—Dante has all the narrowness and superstition of his times. Hence his pages contain much that to the modern world is grotesque and barbarous. And yet these same pages prove him greater than his age; they fix his rank as one of the three or four great poets of all the ages.

The scholar who scales the heights and sounds the depths of Dante's "mystic, unfathomable song," who throws light on its obscurities and places its beauties in full relief, performs an inestimable service to the general reader.

Among interpreters of the great Florentine poet, Mr. Wilstach has won a worthy place. The notes which accompany this translation show wide research and a just appreciation of the reader's needs. A carefully prepared index, adds value to a work which must prove a valuable acquisition to every library.

A third volume by the same hand, kindred in scope and purpose to the "Virgilians," and embodying the result of long years of Dantean study, will soon appear. Two volumes, crown, 8 vo., $5.00.

A SCAPEGRACE BROTHER.

CHICAGO, Dec. 29.—It is said that Ward, alias Ely, under arrest in St. Louis for attempting to rob Asheff in the street yesterday, is a brother of Dr. C. F. Ely, a well known physician of this city. Dr. Ely says he has paid about $8,000 to get his brother out of various scrapes, and would not be surprised if the alleged robber was his brother.

Admiral Luce Firmly Demands Two Million Dollars Indemnity From Hayti.

Contradictory Statements as to the Actual Condition of Affairs at Pt au Prince.

A Passenger Just Landed in the States Says Disaster and Lawlessness Reigns.

NEW YORK, Dec. 29.—The steamer Prinz Maurits arrived from Port au Prince this morning bringing the first mails for several weeks. Chief Officer Sibberlee said: "Everything was quiet in Port au Prince while we were there. The people seem to be satisfied with the election of Legitime as President of the republic. When we entered Port au Prince we saw the Haytien Republic covered with American flags, and a number of men from the United States war ship Galena were on board. On the day we left, the 22nd, President Legitime was given a reception on board the Galena." Mr. Sibberlee said he learned there was no bombardment of Cape Haytien, but that all the northern ports were blockaded.

A PASSENGER'S STORY.

The story told by Celtie De Delva, H. Seraguimot and other passengers on the Prinz Maurits, presents the situation in Hayti in an entirely different light. While the steamer was at Jacmel constant rioting was in progress. No business was transacted and disorder and lawlessness reigned. On Dec. 20, the day of sailing, two bands of the adherents of the opposing leaders, Legitime and Hippolyte, met in the street and firing at once began and was warmly kept up. The men were uniformed but were with no recognized leaders. A frame house was set afire, and the flames spread unchecked throughout the town. The fire was still in progress when the steamer sailed, and the destruction of the town was thought to be imminent. At Port au Prince, where the steamer next touched, the situation was almost as bad. The mob reigned supreme, and no authority was recognized. All business was at a standstill.

DEMANDS $2,000,000 INDEMNITY.

NEW YORK, Dec. 29.—A Mail and Express Port au Prince special says: "The Galena and Yantic are still at Port au Prince. Admiral Luce and President Legitime are in friendly communication but the United States officer firmly demands $2,000,000 indemnity for this government. The French minister is reported to have dispatched orders for a squadron of four vessels to report at once in Port au Prince. The German fleet is expected daily. The Haytian difficulty is not yet over, and affairs are getting more and more complicated.

BREAKING AWAY.

Canada Negotiates With Spain Without England's Authority.

LONDON, Dec. 29.—Madrid advices show that the Spanish government is waiting for the arrival of a Canadian commissioner to enter into negotiations to promote trade between Canada and the Spanish West Indies, but the political situation in Spain may possibly hamper the progress of these negotiations. The fact that it is expected that they will be conducted directly between the colony and foreign power, is significant, and opens the whole question of the authority of England over her dependencies.

Citizens by Intent Only.

Howard Lake Herald.

The population of the Northwest is largely of foreign birth. The larger part of our farmers and no small proportion of our business and professional men, were born on European soil. They are Americans by choice, not birth. It is therefore a fact somewhat ominous that a large per cent., perhaps not less than three-fourths, of this population are not yet naturalized, have obtained their first papers only, and are therefore aliens still and citizens by intention only.

The case of Wright County where, out of two thousand foreign settlers taking out first papers as a declaration of intent to become citizens, but two hundred have applied for second papers and actually become citizens, is by no means an exceptional case. Many a county can tell a similar story. The clerk of court of Hennepin reports that of upwards of 30,000 foreigners who have taken out first or declaration papers in that county, but 1378 have taken out second or citizenship papers. This means that less than five per cent of the voters of foreign birth in the largest metropolis in the state are actual citizens. According to our state constitution, "Aliens declaring their intention to become citizens" are allowed to vote. Having secured this right the settler, often uniformed, sometimes indifferent, or else dreading the time and trouble, lets the matter pass, unless compelled otherwise by circumstances, until finally both he and his neighbors regard his citizenship as actually secured. This state of affairs is common throughout the Northwest. There are alies in every village. The farming communities are filled with alies. Many townships are nine-tenths aliens—aliens in their own homes and in the land of their choice.

As to the point that taking out the first papers of naturalization does not admit the applicant to citizenship, there is not the slightest doubt. The United States statutes on this subject bears but one interpretation when it names as the first of several conditions to naturalization: "He shall declare on oath * * * * two years, at least, prior to admission, that it is bona fide his intention to become a citizen," etc. The clause in the state constitution which speaks of "aliens declaring their intention to become citizens," is in itself conclusive. A. P. Morse, in his legal text-book upon the subject, says, "the declaration of the intention to become a citizen has in itself no effect on the nationality of the individual: he remains an alien till final admission to citizenship." In proof the author cites the treaties between the United States and Austria, Baden, Bavaria, Hesse, Mexico, North Germany, Sweden and Norway, Wurtemberg and Ecuador. The late Lord Chief Justice Cockburn of England, in his able discussion of the subject of nationality, "in the view of other nations than our own," sums up the subject with the following pointed conclusion:

"That nothing short of actual naturalization, carried out by such solemn and formal act as the law of the particular country may require, will have this effect, (confer citizenship.) Domicile, residence preliminary to naturalization, declaration of intention, with renunciation of former allegiance or rights, will not suffice to give the character of citizen, or subject of the country of adoption, which can be acquired only by the act of naturalization itself."

According to the census of 1880 the voting population of Minnesota by nationality, stood in the ratio of 123,000 of foreign birth to 88,000 native. If that ratio continues, as approximately it does, and if the figures for Wriht and Hennepin Counties are representative of the naturalized foreign vote of the state, Minnesota is confronted with the interesting fact that a majority of about 25,000 of its voters are according to law still aliens. The officers of the state are therefore elected, and public affairs controlled, by a majority, not citizens, but of aliens who have simply declared their intent to become citizens. By law still subjects of foreign princes and potentates, this majority holds in its power the control of an American state. That power, it is true, happens to be legitimately used; still its existence is an anomaly inconsistent with the spirit of American institutions, and should be radically modified by bringing the alien majority into the fold of citizenship. It is evident that the subject is one on which the public needs education, and especially the alien portion. Agitation by the press, and especially by state papers printed in alien languages, can do much. But it is apparent that the state itself through executive and legislative measures must give the matter special attention and treatment, if the great bulk of our population is politically to be completely assimilated.

But however important the subject of naturalization may be to the state, it is of still more vital importance to the individual who by failure to comply with the law shuts himself out of the rights and privileges of citizenship. Having declared through first papers his intention to become a citizen, he is still allowed the privilege to vote and also to file on a homestead; but he cannot hold any office under the general government, he cannot prove up and secure a title to homestead or pre-emption, he cannot have the protection of the U. S. flag in the neutral or foreign territory, and his children on becoming of age are likewise aliens. He has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce all allegiance to his former country, yet is still an alien in the country of his choice, and leaves his offspring aliens after him. He has left the old country and has obtained no legal title in the new. He has declared his intention to renounce the government of his birth and yet cannot claim the full protection of the government under which he lives. He is the man without a country, a wanderer from his native land, and a stranger on the adopted soil where lie his home and hopes, his family and his future fortunes. A residence of five years in the United States and one year in the state, with two witnesses to the fact before a clerk of court, is all that is necessary to receive the dignity of full citizenship. The expense is but a few cents. Once possessed with a knowledge of the facts, the alien voter cannot, it would seem, hesitate to step into citizen's garb and privileges.

A Well Built Road.

Opening up a New Territory for Capitalists.

St. Paul Globe.

Messrs. Mark D. Flower, Calvin P. Bailey and Lester R. Elwood, the commission appointed to inspect the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad, yesterday forwarded their report to Gov. McGill. The road inspected consisted of twenty miles, beginning at Cloquet, in Carlton County, and running in a northwesterly direction along the southwesterly bank of the St. Louis River. The commission report the road bed well made, and an average of 3,000 ties for each mile; rails of steel, weighing sixty-two pounds to the yard, and of the standard gauge. The character of the construction and the material used in it in every respect first-class. The report being favorable, the railroad company is entitled to certain land grants along the route of the line constructed. Private Secretary Moore, who accompanied the commission, said: "The road is going to open up a fine piece of country. There are about 160 miles of timber. The people of Minnesota don't half understand what vast wealth there is in the state. We only want more capital to open it out. I was told that at Cloquet there is a lumber company with sufficient lumber on hand to keep their mills going fifty years."

The River Horrors.

Duluth Tribune.

To anyone who has ever seen a Mississippi River steamboat the surprise at the recent loss of life by the burning of a couple of them will not be great. They are evidently built so that as little room as possible may be given up to passengers' quarters, and the superstructure is raised high above the deck so that there may be plenty of room for freight handling below. That they may add as little as possible to the boat's draught the cabins are constructed of pine as cheaply as possible. The hold and deck are then filled with hundreds of bales of cotton, and it is easy to imagine how rapidly the tinder boxes burn once a spark of fire gets into the cotton.

The appalling loss of life, however, invariably incident to the burning of a Mississippi River steamer, might be materially lessened if people could be taught anything by warnings. How many sad lessons are taught each year by the omnipresent panic? Will the time ever come when rational people can control themselves under such circumstances? It certainly begins to look as though it would not. To the wild terror that takes hold of some people and is thus communicated to others may be attributed one-half the fatalities attending sudden calamities. It is time people gained sufficient control over their faculties to prevent their desertion in emergencies. If such time ever does arrive the saving of many lives will be the result.

Sauk Rapids Sentinel.

The Northfield News has developed into a straight out-and-out advocate of Senator Sabin's re-election, and oppose Mr. Washburn with all its vigor, and last week it devoted nearly two pages in an effort to show that Sabin has by far the largest following, much of which of course is bluff. There is one thing however, which editor Heatwole can not be accused of, and that is doing half-way work for those whom he undertakes to suport; and usually he does not leave anything undone to be on the winning side, and yet, unlike many others, he does not enter into or endorse personal abuse, which is as it should be. If Mr. Heatwole is on the winning side in this contest, we will not only admit that he is good looking but a genuine "dandy."

Little Falls Transcript: Even Sabin's opponents admit that he is gaining ground in the senatorial fight, and that his canvas is being conducted ably. And Washburn's friends admit that his prospects are not so bright as they were a few weeks ago. There are any amount of features in the contest that tend to encourage Sabin's friends and discourage Washburn's, and it is so acknowledged by all of the city papers that are giving Washburn solid support. Sabin has made a very satisfactory senator, and not a word of fault has been found with his official acts. He isn't a Minneapolis man, though, and therefore the papers of the twin cities are all opposing him.

Northfield News: By interviews with the leading Republicans of the north part of Rice county on the senatorial question, we learn that the sentiment of the people favors the selection of a new man for senator; but between the two prominent candidates, Sabin and Washburn, the former has a decided majority.

A Journal for the Farmer.

The Western Rural, published at Chicago by Milton George, a practical Western farmer, is the largest farm, family and reform journal published in the United States. It has proficiently edited departments for every branch of farming, and is a faithful record of every step of progress that is being made in agriculture. It indulges in no theories, but deals only in plain, practical facts and methods that will aid the farmer in making the farm more profitable. A large part of its matter is composed of practical questions asked by farmers and answered by practical men. It answers all questions and prescribes for sick animals free of charge. It exposes all swindlers who seek to prey upon the farming community, and admits to its advertising columns none but reliable advertisements. For thirteen years it has been an unflinching champion of the farmer in his conflict with the rings and monopolies that have been robbing him. It started the Farmers' Alliance and is the friend of all organizations that are for the farming community. It was the first journal to agitate the question of government supervision of railroads and the first to demand legislation to protect the dairy from the unscrupulous bogus butter manufacturers. In a word, it is a paper for the farmer, his wife and children, for the man who believes in justice between class and class, and for all who believe that a pure, practical farm literature and advocate of farmers' rights should be encouraged. Write Milton George, editor and publisher, Chicago, Ill., for sample copy.

Todd County Argus: The press of the state is not as strongly in favor of Washburn for senator as one would suppose by reading the daily papers of St. Paul and Minneapolis. Mr. Washburn is certainly an able man and qulified so far as ability is concerned to fill the place, but he hasn't got wings. The soft palaver dished up by some of the papers is enough to sicken a sensible man and drive him to some other man out of pure disgust. We are not particularly opposed to Mr. Washburn, but we are unable to see any very great service that he has done this state by which he has earned the senatorship. The present incumbent, Mr. Sabin, stands high in the party and is as a man as Mr. Washburn.

P. J. La Chapelle startled the natives by organizing a trot on New Years Day—open to the world. P. J. entered his coal-black four-year-old "Startler" and made the unprecedented record of four miles in 14 minutes, without shoes, and P. J. assures us that he dare not let the out his best for fear of sunstroke—it was so hot that day. The dust rolling off from the race course could be seen for miles and the lemonade and peanut stands haven't had a bigger day for profits this year. P. J. says he is afraid he will have to leave Minnesota and migrate some cooler climate.

Battle Lake Review: Since Senator Sabin returned from Washington the Washburn papers have let up claiming everything. It is a fact that Senator Sabin's chances of being his own successor grow better day by day, and those city papers that are supporting Mr. Washburn and are giving their readers an honest report of the situation as it appears to them, now say that Mr. Sabin is in the lead.

Uncle John Ross is not to be rated second to Hicks, or any other of the less modest weather prophets of the day. He has been prophesying to us for some time, and some way, he manages to strike the right wire every time. One thing we are sorry to hear from his lips—it is that the time of seeding this year, will be unfavorable to the farmers. We hope he is off this time.

AS THE JOURNAL has before remarked the coming session of the legislature is one of great importance to our citizens, involving as it may, much that, if properly attended to, tend to the upbuilding of our country. In conversation with a prominent citizen on Saturday he suggested the calling of a public meeting at an early day to canvass ways and means. As the senatorial is liable to be the all absorbing one and the first vote on that cannot be taken until the 22d there will be plenty of time to canvass the matter but the earlier the better, any day next week would be in good time.

We are sorry to note that our friend, H. E. Ives, of the St. Hilaire Spectator, was defeated for enrolling clerk of the Senate. The successful candidate, W. C. Whitman, is said to be a young man of acknowledged ability. He is the editor of the Ortonville Herald-Star.

A. Dewey who established the Warren Sheaf, then the Fisher Bulletin, then the Graceville Transcript then the Brainerd Daily News and lastly the daily Democrat at Duluth is stranded again, the Democrat proving a white elephant. He is now seeking for new worlds to conquor.

G. D. Francis will not be outdone in his line of business. The newest enterprise he has entered, in connection with his regular cabinet work, is mentioned elsewhere in this issue. It is the chance of a lifetime, and should not go unheeded by the public.

The Washburn forces are playing a great game of bluff just now, claiming to have two votes to Sabin's one. Just what they expect to accomplish is hard to determine. Ex-Senator Windom appeared in St. Paul last week and the rumor was at once spread abroad that "he had come for Sabin's scalp." Of course it is the privilege of anybody to go to St. Paul and to express a preference as to senator but it hardly befits the dignity of a man like Windom to allow such motives to influence his actions, or, if untrue to allow the assertions to go unchallenged. Mr. Windom is undoubtedly a great man but when he allows feelings of revenge to dictate his actions he places himself in a position to cause his best friends regret and weakens whatever influence he may yet have.

The Duluth & Winnipeg R. R.

This line, which for so long a time has seemed to be under a cloud has apparently taken a new lease of life with very encouraging prospects of being completed at an early day. Twenty miles of iron has been laid this fall examined and accepted, and the road is now entitled to a certain portion of its lands. It is the intention of the company to keep a force of men in the field this winter locating and clearing the right of way and performing such work as can be done in the winter, and next spring to put on a large force of graders and push the work to early completion. But they will not have all clear sailing in the prosecution of these plans, in fact there will be determined opposition from rival interests with a fixed determination to defeat the building of the line if possible. The building of that road into this country is fraught with so much importance that there should not be found in the whole length and breadth of it one who would, in any wise, lay a straw in its way. Upon the other hand we should be a unit in the endeavor to aid the road in every possible way. There is much that we can do to assist needed legislation and otherwise, and all should be willing and anxious to contribute his mite in the good cause. The road will be an independent line and hence of greater value to us than if otherwise. We are confident that if this matter was fully understood our people would be enthusiastic in their support. The road is now where it needs the support of the sentiment of this country more than it ever will and if we now lend that support, time will fully justify our confidence and our action. All who are workers in the good cause to-day will in time be proud of their action when the road shall be an accomplished fact, a lasting monument to the sagacity and foresight of its projectors and backers. Should there be anyone not yet convinced that the line is and will be an independent one, all he has to do to convince himself is to look into the matter thoroughly and the importance of the question will justify all needed trouble.

KING CARNIVAL.

King Carnival will hold his annual festival in the fourth year of his reign at his Ice Palace of the north land, at St. Paul, Minnesota, beginning January 23d and ending February 1st, 1889.

The St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway, for the accommodation of their patrons, will sell tickets at very low rates from all points on their lines to St. Paul on and between the dates given above.

Preparations are being made on a scale commensurate with the importance of this great event, for an entertainment on a scale heretofore unequalled by previous carnivals.

There will be grand processions of the various Toboggan clubs loyal subjects to his royal highness, King Carnival, during the carnival.

The magnificent Ice Palace, to be erected near the banks of the Father of the Waters, the Mississippi, will be constructed on a more elaborate plan and on a scale of grandeur never before attempted. All Carnival clubs in the Northwest will attend the grand storming of the Ice Palace which takes place during the Carnival. There will be Ski races hotly contested by the various Scandinavian Ski Clubs, while the Sons of Old Scotia will meet in friendly rivalry on the Curling Grounds.

For further information apply to your St. P., M. & M. Ticket Agent, or F. I. Whitney, General Passenger and Ticket Agent, St. Paul, Minn.

Misconstrued.

ED. JOURNAL: Judging from certain remarks that have reached my ears concerning my short article in a recent issue of THE JOURNAL, regarding the attendance of teachers at the high school, I infer that persons making such remarks thought it an attempt to exalt the high school and underrate the good done by other institutions mentioned. This was not the case. The article was intended for those WHO COULD NOT attend the aforementioned institutions. There was no intention on my part to convey to the mind of the reader any idea of antagonism as existing between the local and foreign schools. I said then, as I say now, that the teacher who does not make the best of the good at hand, would not scale to the topmost round of the ladder of success, under the most favorable circumstances. Let it be understood that neither in this or the former article, is there a thought of COMPARISON between our excellent high school, and our equally excellent normals. Each has its own work to perform, and it is for those intending to improve themselves thereby, to decide which branch of work is required in their particular cases.

ED. JOURNAL: Will some of our elevator men please rise up and explain why rejected wheat is worth only twenty-six cents per bushel? Last week I hauled a load of rejected wheat to the Terrebonne mill, and had it ground. I received twenty lbs. of flour and twelve and one-half lbs. of bran and shorts per bushel. Estimating the flour at three cents, and the bran and shorts at one-half cent per pound, which is a very low estimate. I received sixty-six and one fourth cents per bushel for my wheat, besides one-eighth for grinding, which makes the wheat worth seventy-five cents per bushel. I for one would like to know why the elevators can't pay at least fifty cents for the above grade of wheat.

CONGRESSIONAL.

Weekly Resume of the Proceedings of the Senate and House.

Wednesday Jan. 2.

SENATE.—Senator Hoar to-day introduced a resolution, which was adopted asking the president to transmit to congress any correspondence that may have been had with Great Britain, concerning the seal fisheries in or near Behring's straits, especially as to the seizure of any vessel of the United States or other country and what relations governing the fisheries have been adopted by this government. Mr. Hoar says there have been and are still widespread complaints of unjust discrimination made against American vessels; that while they are not permitted to take seals out at sea, which is perfectly proper and right, no interference is made with the operations of the vessels of the other countries, particularly those of Great Britain, and he wants to know why.

HOUSE.—Mr. Springer, when the omnibus territorial bill is taken up in the house, will offer an amendment giving the territories the following names: North Dakota—Dakota; South Dakota—Winona; New Mexico—Montezuma; Washington—Tacoma.

Mr. Sayers of Texas, from the committee on appropriations, reported to the house today the fortifications appropriation bill. It provides for an appropriation of $890,000, as against an appropriation of $3,972,000 for 1889, and an estimate of $5,552,000.

Thursday January 3rd.

SENATE—Senator Stewart introduced a bill to-day authorizing the secretary of the treasury to refund all income taxes, which, upon principles subsequently settled by decisions of the supreme court, are shown to have been illegally and unconstitutionally collected and have not heretofore been refunded. The money is to be paid out by the commissioner of internal revenue provided the refund is made within two years from the passage of the act.

HOUSE.—The house has appointed conferees on the bill forfeiting lands granted to the Ontonagon railway. They will meet with senate conferees probably, and, it is believed, will agree to a bill it will pass before the session ends.

Mr. Reed, of Maine, from the committee on rules, offered a resolution providing that during the present session of congress there shall be no call of the states and territories on the first and third Mondays of each month and it was adopted.

Friday, Jan. 4.

SENATE.—The senate resumed work on the tariff bill and a long and decidedly uninteresting debate was the result.

Mr. Hale introduced a bill to reorganize and equalize the rank and pay of the personnel of the navy. The bill provides that there shall be on the active list of line officers, 1 admiral, 1 vice admiral, 20 rear admirals, 15 commodores, 45 captains 90 commanders, 100 lieutenant commanders, 323 lieutenants, 200 ensigns and the number of naval cadets now allowed by law.

Mr. Sherman, from the committee on foreign relations, reported a resolution which was agreed to, calling on the president for correspondence and information touching recent occurrences in the Island of Hayti, both as relates to the government there, and to the seizure and delivery of the American vessel by the Haytian republic.

HOUSE.—The house next took up the Nicaragua canal bill, with the amendments offered to it in committee of the whole, on which the previous question was ordered before the holiday recess. The amendment offered by Mr. Holman, providing that nothing in the act shall be construed to commit the United States to any liability on account of the Nicaragua company, and requiring this proviso to be printed on every bond, certificate of stock, or other obligation issued by the company, agreed to. The amendment offered by Mr. Williams, providing that no certificate of stock shall be issued until at least 10 per cent shall be paid or in money; that the stock shall not be assignable until the whole of the same shall be paid in; that no bonds in excess of the amount of the capital shall amount to $5,000,000, was agreed to—yeas 102, nays 25. The amendment offered by Mr. Bland, reserving to congress the right to alter, amend or repeal this act and to regulate the tariff rates for the transportation of persons or property, was agreed to. The bill passed—yeas 157, nays 34.

Saturday, Jan. 5.

SENATE.—Senator Plumb introduced a bill to create a customs commission and define its duties, which was offered to the committee on finance. Its object is to establish a permanent customs commission in the treasury department, which shall make investigations respecting the working of the tariff, at which it shall furnish information thereon to congress and others when called upon.

The investigation into the conduct of the supervising architect's office by a senate subcommitte began. It was developed that Architect Freret has awarded contracts for the preparation of plans for four or five buildings to architects in Washington, and that clerks employed in his office are working on these plans out of office hours.

HOUSE.—Mr. Springer introduced in the house a joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment authorizing congress to make a uniform law of marriage and divorce.

The greater part of the time in the house was occupied in filli-bustering against the resolution to abolish, for the remainder of the session, the call of states for the introduction of the bills on the first and third Mondays of each month. Nothing was accomplished.

HintsFor Cold Weather.

Never deem it too much trouble to build a fire when one is necessary, but if you can do so comfortably, accustom yourself to a moderately warm atmosphere.

Tight well-built houses are a great saving of fuel, but much attention should be paid to their proper ventilation.

If no other means have been provided lower one of the windows from the top nearly an inch, and tack a piece af pasteboard on the upper edge of the sash in such a manner that it will direct the air toward the ceiling; in this way, a draft may be prevented and the atmosphere will still be kept perfectly pure.

The best fuel is wood.

It is the healthiest because it contains the most oxygen; coal has none, and consequently the oxygen necessary for its combustion must be supplied from the air room; this, and not the escape of the gas, is what usually renders the air where coal is burned, so close and oppressive.

Close-grained wood, like hickory and hard maple, gives out the greatest amount of heat; the open-grained, like pine and bass-wood, heats the quickest.

The valve of fuel as heating material is determined by the amount of water which a pound will heat to a given temperature. One pound of wood will convert 40 pounds of ice into boiling water, while a pound of coal will heat nearly 80 pounds. From this we find that coal is nearly twice as good for heating purposes as wood.

An Heroic Girl.

"George, 'dear,'' she said, with a pleading, Amelie Rives look upon her face, "surely you are not going thus early? Have you ceased to love me?"

"No, darling, my love for you is as a rock; it will endure," George replied, with emotion; "but early, why, it is after 1 o'clock, and (dropping heavily into a chair) "the boss says if the store isn't open and the steps washed down hereafter at 6 o'clock I lose my job."

"Go, go, George," exclaimed the girl, with noble heroism, "the job is about all we will have to claim as our own.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Hints for the Home.

For cleaning brass use a thin paste of plate powder, two tablespoonfuls of vinegar, four tablespoonfuls of alcohol. Rub with a piece or flannel; polish with chamois.

Two large silver salt cellars are now used, one at each end of the table. These are to be passed to each guest, who will remove a little salt to his empty individual salt-cellar.

Corsages are extremely varied in style, and none are wholly plain in effect. The directorio and empire effects and characteristics still prevail very largely.

Jet, rich silk-cord passementeries, and gold and silver gimys and galloons are as fashionable as if they had never been seen before this season.

A quick cure for burns is to apply a layer of common salt and saturate it with laudanum. Hold it in place an hour or so by a simple bandage. The smarting sensation disappears rapidly, and the burn gets well.

Kettle-holders made of felt, covered one side with flannel, the other side with brocade, are much better than many more elaborate concoctions. When tea is made at table they are almost a necessity.

It is a good plan to keep a quantity of sifted flour in the pantry, ready for the making of buscuits, cake or pie, so as to be prepared if they are wanted in a hurry, as in case of company coming and remaining to a meal.

A very complete filling for open cracks in floors may be made by thoroughly soaking newspapers in a paste made of one pound of flour, three quarts of water, a teaspoonful of alum, thoroughly boiled and mixed; make the final mixture about as thick as putty, and it will harden like papier-mache.

Into the hands of every housewife is committed a casket far more precious than the result of any jewellers' skill. Unseen thieves are continually lurking about that threaten its safety, never so numerous as in early winter. The casket is the health of the family; the danger that threatens it, disease. Its preservation depends on watchfulness born of love.

As a dressing for ladies' shoes nothing equals vaseline, making the leather soft and pliable without soiling the garments in contract. Where the feet sweat, burnt alum and glycerine—one of the former to two of the latter—rubbed on the feet at night, and a light or open sock worn, the feet washed in the morning with tepid water, will keep them during the day free from odor, so disagreeable to those persons who are suffers.

In the Fashion.

White linen and not colored is now the style this season. Plush and velvet as table decorators have seen their day, and housekeepers are again delighting in the smooth satiny white linen of their mother's day, but art has come to stay but not in colors. The art table cloth of the season although white and satiny has a Spanish or oriental design embroidered in white silk floss or floselle in an art stitch all over the linen. Milk-white linen silver and crystal begins a new reign, and colored glass is on the wane. Colored cloths, however, are as popular as ever for luncheon, and in fact the important linens for lunchs and teas are in every tint which modern art furnishes. Sea-green, buff and straw, however, are more stylish than reds or blues.

"Stoop, Stoop.

Benjamin Franklin, when a lad of eighteen, had a bit of advice literally "beat into his head." He went, at one time, to call upon Rev. Cotton Mather, who received him in his library, but when his guest left showed him a shorter way out of the house through a narrow passage, which was crossed by a beam overhead. They were busily engaged in conversation, when the minister suddenly cried out, "Stoop, stoop!" Not understanding what was meant, Franklin bumped his head against the beam. Mr. Mather never missed a chance for moral instruction, so he said to the boy, "You are young, and have the world before you; go through it, and you will miss many hard thumps." Franklin was often reminded, in after years, of the advice so forcibly given, and said that it did him good service.—Congregationalist.

The Housewife's Eye.

The utmost care on the part of the housewife is the price paid for the health of the family. We have all heard the story of the father of the German bride who gave his daughter a golden casket, with the injunction not to pass it to any other hands, for it held a charm which, in her keeping, would be of inestimable value to her as the mistress of a house. Not only was she to have the entire care of it, but she was to take it every morning to the cellar, the kitchen and the stable, and to remain with it in each place for three minutes. After the lapse of three years the father was to send the key that the secret of the talisman might be discovered. Directions were followed the key sent and the casket opened, when it was found to contain an old parchment, upon which was written, "The eye of the mistress is worth a hundred pairs of servants' hands." The wise father knew that a practice of inspection, followed faithfully for a period of three years, with such results as we may reasonably believe followed, would be perpetuated—that the casket and hidden charms would have accomplished their mission.

LOVE AFTER DEATH.

They say if our beloved dead
Should seek the old familiar place,
Some stranger would be there instead,
And they would find no welcome face

I cannot tell how that may be
In other homes, but this I know;
Could my lost darling come to me,
That she would never find it so.

Oft-times the flowers have come and gone,
Oft-times the winter winds have blown,
The while her peaceful rest went on,
And I have learned to live alone.

Have slowly learned from day to day,
In all life's task to bear my part;
But, whether grave or whether gay,
I hide her memory in my heart.

Fond, faithful love has blessed my way,
And friends are round me, true and tried;
They have their place, but hers today
Is empty as the day she died.

How would I spring with bated breath,
And joy too deep for word or sign,
To take my darling home from death,
And once again to call her mine.

I dare not dream the blissful dreams,
It fills my heart with wild unrest
Where yonder cold white marble gleams
She still must slumber. God knows best.

But this I know, that those who say
Our best beloved would find no place
Have never hungered every day
Through years and years, for one sweet face
—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

MURDEROUS LONDON.

W. P. Frith, in Christmas Time.

It is said that the memories of elderly people, while somewhat failing as to recent events, are often extraordinarly clear in respect of matters connected with the experience of their days. It would be vain for me to deny that I am an elderly person, for I have been forced to confess in "another place" that I was born in the year 1819, and have consequently arrived at the end of the allotted span; and though, as we are told, there are some whose pilgrimage is lengthened beyond the usual lease, then is their but sickness and sorrow. Of the latter I have had my share; of the former I am most thankful to say I know nothing. In respect of memory, I can claim exemption from the weakness that is said to afflict people of threescore and ten, for I have found it as true to me when called upon to record events that happened half a century since as it is to those of more recent times.

Occurrences so startling as to shake the country from one end to the other make indelible impressions on the feeblest memories. I suppose no one living at the time of the Mar murders can have forgotten the frantic terror that possessed the community till the murder was discovered. Numbers now living may have seen the body of the suicide—the man hung himself in prison—as it was carried, in a cart, about the locality of his crimes, exposed to the scrutiny of thousands of his fellow-creatures. I can vividly recall a certain evening at my home in Harrowgate—being about 12 years old—when my father, who had been reading the times, exclaimed, "Well, of all the horrors I ever hear of this beats everything!"

"What's the matter?" said my mother.

"The doctors are to blame; if there were no doctors this wouldn't have happened."

"What wouldn't have happened? You look horrified, What is it?" again demanded my mother.

"What is it?" exclaimed my father, "Why, they have been killing people to supply the doctors with bodies to be dissected—that's what has happened. Here is a long account—a couple of wretches—no, there's three of 'em, Bishop, Williams, and another—who have been leagued together to decoy people into their place, smother them, then put their bodies into sacks, and then take them to the hospitals to be cut up."

"It isn't true! I don't believe it," said my mother.

"Well, I hope it isn't," said my father, "but here it is all in print."

In 1832 London news took many hours in reaching Yorkshire, but subsequent account only served to confirm the first announcement, of course accompinied by fearful exaggerations. Instances were given of respectable citizens who were waylaid in lonely places; a "pitch-plaster" suddenly placed over mouth and nose speedily produced insensibility; one of the murderers carried a sack, and in a few moments the respectable citizen was on his way to the surgeon. Another method of pursuing this "dreadful trade" was for the confederates to fix upon an evident stranger—a countryman perhaps—whose curious stare at London sights revealed him to the operators, who would civilly accost him and offer their services. "Had he seen the Tower?" "No, that was just what he wanted to see." "Well, they were going that way, and would be most happy, etc., etc."

By the way of the murderer was not the way to the Tower, but to his own house, into which the victim was induced to enter, and after a little persuasion to take a light refreshment. Bread and cheese and beer were produced.

"This beer has a rum taste," says the guest.

"Has it?" says the host: "Just let me taste it. Why, you seem a little sleepy—come a long way, I suppose. Here is some first rate brandy, take a good swig of that, that's the stuff to keep your eyes open." Judging from the effect, that it was the stuff to keep the eyes shut, for the countryman had no sooner taken one "swig" than he fell into a deep sleep.

The next act in this performance was to strip the body and carry it to a well in the back yard of the house: a cord was then tied to the feet, and the body was plunged head foremost into the well. "After," as one of the murderers said in his confession, "we had allowed time for all trace of the brandy to be washed away, the dead man was drawn up, put into a sack, and one of us took him to the doctors; no questions was asked, we was paid the money, and come away."

To all these dreadful details did we, my brother and I, seriously incline, with the result on my part of a considerable amount of terror on my first visit to London.

I was on my way to school at St. Margaret's, and I knew I must be some days in London. I felt sure I should betray myself as a stranger; I should lose my way, I should start about me, like that unhappy countryman; but I made up my mind to reply to no stranger, "charmed he never so wisely." Still, there was the "pitch plaster;" no police then, and if there were, how could one call for help with that awful thing over one's month? All this was very silly; my excuse may be that I was but a boy, somewhat imaginative, always picturing possible and impossible casualities. For the short time I was in London I never left Brook street, so there was no fear of losing myself; my aunt kindly took me once to the play, and as we went and returned in a hackney coach I felt tolerably safe; but I confess much as I hated school, I was glad to go away even to that nauseus place, so that I might leave murderous London behind me.

Let those of my friends who read this confession with a contemptuous smile on their somewhat aged faces remember the days of the garroters, and then let them lay their hands on the place where their hearts ought to be and then declare—if they can do so without committing perjury—that they never walked home from some jovial gathering with the dread of being choked and robbed before they got there!

I appeal to thee, my old friend Rivers! didst not thou purposely put on a ragged coat and seedy trousers, together with a wideawake, worn and weather-stained (used in thy famous picture of "The Starving Peasant"), so that the garroter might pass thee by as unprofitable plunder? What but cowardly fear, similar to that which I acknowledge, possessed thee when thou misconducted thyself in that dastardly fashion? And you, O my friends Du Maurier and Prinsep, do you not remember dining at Pembridge Villas in garroting times, when your fellow-guest, Hepworth Dixon, gave us a thrilling account of an attack upon him by two garroters, how he struggled with them when they tried to put "the hug" upon him; how with a natural dread of those prowling miscreants, he had armed himself with a bowie-knife, the first flash of which in their faces frightened the garotters away; and even before the applause of Dixon's valor had ceased among us, did not you, Du Maurier, declare that you were one of the garotters, and that it was Dixon who ran away? And did not Prinsep, A. R. A., after declaring he was the second garotter, produce a penknife from his waistcoat pocket and exclaim: "And here is the bowie knife which you dropped when you ran?"

Gentle reader, this is but the prelude to my swelling tale, for the truth of which I pledge my word.

Among my acquaintances are several deaf-and-dumb artists, one or two extremely clever ones. The study of art recommends itself peculiarly to those who are so terribly afflicted, being, perhaps, the only one they could pursue, and then only under conditions of great difficulty. Mr. George Road, after passing some years in Rome—as was the custom fifty years ago—came to England and pitched his tent in Southampton street, Fitzroy square. He was deaf, dumb, and a bachelor, possessing, I believe, sufficient private means to make him independent of his profession, and to enable him to devote himself to what are called "the highest branches of the art;" he was, in fact, an historical painter of considerable merit. His studio was a large room, with the usual decorations and properties of the well-to-do painter. There were casts from the antique, armor, tapestry and a family of lay figures, consisting of a male, female and a child; and in a smaller room, off the studio, the artist keeps a goodly assortment of brushes, colors and other necessities of his profession. My render must bear in mind that I am speaking of the time when Burke and Hare, whose effigies now figure in Madame Tussaud's Chamber of Horrors—murders on the lines of Bishop and Williams—had horrified London and the country by their crimes. It was, in fact, just after the execution of those worthies that Mr. Road advertised for a man-servant. The artist had seen several specimens of the London footman, none of which satisfied him, when, to use a parliamentary phrase, he "appealed to the country," and on a dull morning in November a young man presented himself in Southampton street and rang the painter's bell.

I must premise that the would-be servant was of a very timorous nature; this was his first experience of London, a place in which murder was in the air, with the dread of Burke—or rather, being burked, as it was called—in full possession of him. He had asked his way, and found it with great difficulty, to Southampton street. I have come from Gloucestershire," said he to the woman who opened the door to him, "to take a place with this gentleman"—showing her the advertisement— "if it suits me thou knows." "All right," said the maid, "walk in."

The house was dark, the staircase gloomy, and the trembling countryman was shown into the dimly-lighted painting room.

It was an awful place! the only light came from one half-closed window. The antique casts of faces, hands and feet, looking like death in their ghastly whiteness, deepened his terrors. What did it all mean? had he fallen into the den of a murderer? and what are those three things covered up with white sheets? As he approached the lay figures his fears were intensified; he touched the largest one—he started back with horror! Yes! it is a human body! it was an arm he felt, and then a leg; he turned, and lo! a man with some instrument (a palette) in his left hand, and a huge (pallette) in his right! Road had been mixing some lake and vermilion in the small room for the robe of King Lear.

This finished the countryman. He seized the poker and began backing toward the door. The dumb man uttered some inarticulate sounds which only served to increase the man's terrors.

"What does thee say, thou villain? Come another step and I'll knock thy brains out! Here, hi!" he shouted—"murder murder!"

The door opened and the maid appeared. "What's the matter?" said the girl. "What are you shouting about? they'll hear you in the street."

I want 'em to hear," said the affrighted man; "I want to get out of this place; thee open the door and let me out this minute—murder, murder!"

A small crowd had collected, to which the breathless countryman said, "One of them burkers lives here; he's been and tried to murder me! he's got a knife! there's dead bodies upstairs—I tell you there is, I saw 'em three of em!"

"What's that you say?" said a man. "I am from Bow street; what do you say?"

"I say there's murder been done here, the bodies is upstairs in a dark room, and all sorts of things—go and look for yourself."

The Bow street runner entered the house, and presently returned with a smile on his face. "You have made a mistake, my friend—there are no dead bodies; the gentleman is an artist, and——"

"A what?" shrieked the countryman, "I tell thee he tried to kill me; he come up to me with a bloody knife in his hand. Here, I've had enough of this; it's my opinion you are all alike in this darned place!"

"Then you had better leave it," said the officer. "Where do you want to go to?"

"Blue Boar, Holborn, where I come from; I want to get back to Gloucestershire, that's where I want to go to, and I don't know the way a bit."

"Well! there, take that hackney coach; he will land you at the Blue Boar safe enough."

"And if ever I come to this place again may I be"—somethinged. The word was lost by the banging of the coach-door.

A Wonderful Nation.

Today the republic of the United States has no rival on the face of the globe in natural resources in wealth, in the general intelligence of its people. There is little use in taking a glance over the past, for nearly every man of intelligence is familiar with the history of the country. He knows that a dozen years less than half a century ago the republic of the United States included thirty-one states and five territories, if we include among the territories the District of Columbia. The area then was, it is now, not including the Alaska purchase, 3,002,862 square miles. The population was less than 25,000,000. West Virginia was the center of population. The population in the territory, west of the Mississippi river, a territory 2,135,840 miles in extent, was at this time only 1,999,404. It was supposed that most of this extensive area was composed of desert lands and alkali plains.

The old school geographies displayed in conspicuous letters a "Great American Desert," which by the hand of man has since been transformed into as fertile and productive farms as any in the east. This trans-Mississippi region today includes twelve states and nine territories, and the United States census of 1880 gave it a population of 11,259,360. In 1850 the value of all property west of the Mississippi river was, in the states, $509,704,479 and in the territories $11,224,026. In 1880 this had increased to territories to $2,994,000-000.

The ratio of increase in values throughout the entire country was just as remarkable. In 1850 the value of real and personal property in the United States was $7,135,780-328. In 1880 the value wos $43,-642,000,000. The population has increased from 23,191,876 in 1850 to 50,152,866 in 1880. The center of population is in the vicinity of Indianapolis, Indiana. The growth in the productiveness of the soil is just as phenomenal. In 1849 the corn crop was 592,071,104 bushels. In 1879 it was 1,754,521,676 bushels. The wheat crop in 1849 was 100,485,944 bushels and in 1879 it was 459,483,-137 bushels. The corn acreage in 1849 was 25,000,000 acres; in 1879 it was 62,000,000 acres. The wheat acreage in 1849 was 10,000,000 in 1879 it was 35,430,333. In 1853 the mileage of the railroads was 12,-908. In 1882 there were in operation 114,930 miles of railroads.

If this percentage of growth continues in the next half century where shall we be as a nation? The immigration is increasing every year. It seems that Europe is already too full to hold with profit its rapidly growing population. Look at the immigration figures and note the remarkable increase. In 1881 the number of immigrants were 669,431; in 1882, 788,992; in 1883, 603,322; in 1884, 518,592; in 1885, 395,346; in 1886, 334,203; 1887, 509,281. Making a total immigration in seven years of 3,819,167. This immigration will increase rather than diminish. It will be many years—very many years—before the ratio of population in this republic equals that of the older countries today.

In 1880 the ratio of population per square mile of territory in the United States was 16.70. In the same year the ratio of population in the British isles was 269,-49; in China it was 260,59; in Germany, 197.48; France, 176.89; Japan, 212.89; British India, 223.56; Belgium, 461.95. If the ratio of the population in this country were equal to the present ratio of population in France we should have a population of 531,846,588. This growth, at the rate of increase so far observed in our material progress would give us this population in a decade less than a century. Thirty years from now at the same percentage of increase, our population will be ,110,186,310. In fifty years it will be ,186,214,864. There is indeed, no limit to the greatness of the American republic.—Detroit Free Press.

Coldly Scientific.

BY SARAH PIERCE SCARBOROUGH.

"A scientific woman is an ogress,—cold and heartless as an iceberg!" was the exclamation of Mrs. Proctor's companion.

"So I am to infer that the future Mrs. Sainton must be steeped in ignorance as to 'ologies and 'osophies," the lady remarked in reply.

"Precisely so, Mrs. Proctor. Nothing so unfits women for being wives and mothers,—real, warm-hearted home women,—as dabbling in science. Of what earthly good is it for a woman to know how to calculate an eclipse, or evolve wretched smell in a laboratory? It is simply hardening. To paraphrase Gothe, 'The scientific phrases they are accustomed to repeat incessantly end by end becoming convictions, and ossify the organs of affection.' I repeat it,—a scientific woman is cold and heartless as an iceberg, a very ogress."

Mrs. Proctor was not an adept to argument. Had it been a case of match-making, she could have conducted it with skill; but in a word-to-word encounter on a subject like this, she could only banter, and conduct a successful retreat, which she proceeded to do by begging for another ice. Moreover, her own private convictions in general did not differ materially from those voiced by Arthur Sainton. Still, for reasons of her own, she could not endorse such a sweeping statement as the one with which he closed his utterances on the subject.

But being a wise diplomat, if not a wily one, she waived discussion even upon that point, deeming it best to let him discover his own mistake. At the same time she registered a little vow to square accounts with him for this assault upon her sex, when the moment should come in which she might feel assured of an easy victory. So she made a mental note of his phillipics, and sought her young friend, whose future she was endeavoring to arrange according to her own ideas of the eternal fitness of things.

The scheming little woman had planned for Arthur Sainton to be captivated by the unmistakable charms of this friend, and matters between the two had passed so favorably as to delight the elderly plotter. Consequently, when his unlucky genius put such a cold-blooded assertion into his mouth, it struck terror to her heart, as she saw her elaborately reared castle a crumbling mass of ruins, when he should discover the truth, for Jessie Bierstadt was "scientifically inclined."

She had been from childhood a most enthusiastic lover of nature and nature's laws. Her honors in college had all been achieved in that one line, and, seeing nothing in her sex which was incompatible with scientific study and research, she resolved, on leaving its walls, to devote herself to her favorite studies. In pursuance of this resolve she was spending a few weeks in town, attending a course of lectures by a most renowned scientist, preparatory to entering upon practical work. She had supposed that Mr. Sainton, whom she then met for the first time, to be fully aware, in common with other friends, of her proclivities; but, to do the gentleman justice, Mrs. Grundy had, in some unaccountable way, failed to enlighten him on this point, and he had no idea that the stylish, brilliant, cultured lady, whom he so much admired, "dabbled in science."

It was very natural, after this pronouncemento, that Mrs. Proctor should endeavor to dissuade the young lady from entering upon her proposed career. She contented herself at first with mild denunciation of scientific pursuits for women; but when she saw this made no impression upon the independent Miss Bierstadt's determination, she, old a veteran as she was, committed the blunder of observing that men were not usually attracted to women of "such tendencies."

It was an unfortunate speech, and she knew it, as soon as her perverse young friend turned upon her with a peculiar, satirical smile, and said, "That knowledge would decide me, if nothing else could. The man who woos me will have to woo my 'tendencies' as well."

If Mrs. Proctor had thought her possessed of a bias toward strong-mindedness before,—a thing she secretly abhorred in a woman, she was sure of it now, and came nearer endorsing every jot and tittle of Mr. Sainton's declaration than she had thought possible. She confessed to herself in secret an utter impotency, for once, to avert the entire demolition of her plans, and ruefully awaited the end.

Weeks passed, and Mr. Sainton had been as attentive as at first, while the lady herself had received his attentions with the same grace which had been such a charm, until even Mrs. Proctor thought the danger over. When Miss Bierstadt betook herself to her work, leaving him in a state of mind which was divulged to no one except his friend Max Parker, who arrived from a foreign tour some week's later.

In his own apartments, his friend sitting opposite, two fragrant Havanas sending curling waves of smoke aloft, he embraced the moment to unbosom himself of the secret of his state, for such conditions are to men who interchange confidences, when the hour of retiring and the ceremony of taking down the back hair are to women.

Max Parker had received a slight hint of his friend's perplexity, but as recollections of former confidences loomed up before him, he may be pardoned for the levity he indulged in.

"So at last your many grandes passions have culminated in la grande passion!" he queried, as he watched the rings ascend. "I imagine it, too, will vanish like those rings—in air." He replaced his cigar lazily, eyeing his companion from under half-closed lids.

"To be truthful, I do not know what to make of either myself or the lady. I sometimes think I am irrevocably in love, and at the same time I am chilled to the heart. There was a time when I could have spoken without hesitation, but now I alternate between my desire to win her, and the settled conviction that she has no heart to respond to mine."

"Ah, you are badly smitten, I see! Those intermittent fevers are apt to have a long run. But tell me all about it. Where did you find her, and who is she?" Max tipped back his chair, improvised a foot-rest, and prepared to be languidly interested.

"I met her last winter,—a generous, whole-souled, warm-hearted, bewitching woman,—and I was made a complete captive. I met her again, when my duty as one of the Board of Visitors took me to Lofton Seminary, metamorphosed into a professor of science, and such a metamorphosis! I have always said that it hardens women, makes them cold and heartless, to have anything to do with science, and my theory has been as clearly demonstrated as if she had set out to be its practical exponent."

"Professor! and of science! I am not surprised that your fastidious taste has revolted."

"Max," was the curt reply, "just dispossess yourself of the idea that to be a professor a woman has to be made up of queer quirks,—a sort of lay figure for every new-fangled reform. I've cast away even the shreds of such theories. But one still holds, stands eternally fixed in the way of my happiness. She is a lady in every sense of the term,—manners, carriage, and dress,—only"—

"Only what? Name to flaw in your paragon professor-ess."

"Be sensible, Max!" Arther Sainton drew himself up with a severe look. "You know a man of my age is not going to make a fool of himself—he notices everything. She was once a warm-hearted woman,—that I know; but now she is so thoroughly wedded to science that"—

"Pardon, my friend," Max again interrupted, "I hope you are not thinking of committing bigamy. Honestly, though," laughing at the scowl he had evoked, "why should science be an objection? Fancy how instructive it would be to have as a lifelong companion some one capable of conjuring up a myriad host of animalculæ out of every glass of pura-aqua you might wish to quaff; filling your moonlight rambles with discourse on the "milky way," or the latest hypothesis concerning the man-in-the-moon, sunspots, or aurora borealis; your seasoning no longer salt, but sodium chloride; and every stray mosquito a culex pipiens," making a pass for one sailing maliciously within an inch of his nose. "To live up to her 'blue chins,' in fact."

"That is just what would not be pleasant," responded his companion. "But if you stop interrupting me, I will finish what I began. As I said, she is handsome, dresses well, is a good conversationalist, well up in art, literature, and—"

"Science," ended Max mischievously.

"Yes, well up in science; that is the whole in a nutshell. I do believe that she is so infatuated with bioplasm, protoplasm, cells development, earth, air, sea, and sky, that she has developed into an iceberg from the glaciers she expatiates about. She is cold and heartless, and it seems impossible to consider her the same person who won my heart last winter."

"Then why not give it up, as your theory seems to hold?"

"Simply (I may as well own it) because in spite of my belief in my theory, there is a grim fascination in investigating further, hoping to prove it also an untenable one, especially as I am sure she was not without heart at one time, and that it was not averse to me. But the theory holds, and—well—the fascination has such a grip upon me, it holds too."

"How have you found this to hold so well, I should like to know?"

"Let me tell you. At the last session I went out to Lofton, to attend to my duties. Of course they took me to her classes. I could not help thinking how charming she was, or would be, if she would only let those bugs and things alone. She would handle the most despicable looking objects without a shudder. One minute it was a craw-fish which she wanted me to see, and I sat in mortal terror, fearing she was going to ask me to take it. Then she picked up a caterpillar,—one of those fuzzy, woolen ones,—to show its real legs and its false ones, she said. I had placed my elbow upon her table,—so I might be nearer her, to tell the truth,—when some way, accidentally, I hope, the thing dropped down my sleeve. Of course I jumped, —who would not!—and in the act I overturned a paste-board box, which stood near, into my lap. Ugh! Even now, when I think of it, it makes the cold chills race up and down my verbal column, and play hide-and-seek in all my marrow bones. What do you suppose was in it?"

"I can't say," his listener replied in a stifled tone, as, beginning to appreciate the situation, he silently shook with laughter.

"There was a turtle, a miscellany of bugs, worms and hop-toads, a horrible evil-looking thing, neither fish nor fowl, studded with horns, and a snake, one of these miserable grassy-green ones, too."

"'All the charms
Of Sycorax, toads, beetles, bats,'" quoted Max.

"What did you do?" he asked, his voice running up the scale with astonishing velocity, and his question ending in a shriek and a wild 'ha! ha!'"

"Do! Nothing. I simply threw off what things had clung to me, and stood trembling —actually quaking—waiting for her to do the 'doing.'"

"Well— I think— you— did — remarkably well!" Max managed to articulate as he bent back and forth in paroxysms of laughter.

"Was that all?"

"No. She deliberately took up that snake by the tail, put her little white hands over those toads, slipped a paper under the worst looking worms, and, her pets attended to, turned to me with a gracious smile, and said, 'They are perfectly harmless, you know.' Well, I did not know, and it would have been the same if I had; for who could maintain an undisturbed composure with a whole zoological garden turned loose upon him in that startling manner!"

"You are right, my boy; and it was a cool exhibition of utter heartlessness on her part. Why, with such a temperament, you might expect similar experiences any day. If she only kept to rocks and stones, it would not be so bad."

"Yes, it would. I have tried it. I thought if I could get her out of that detestable museum, I might be able to determine whether she really had a heart or not. There was an excursion to the Springs, and I went, with the firm determination to let nothing keep me from my resolve. What do you suppose was the first object which met my gaze when I reached the grounds?"

"Your scientific professor, stylish, handsome, irresitible and tantalizing as ever," quizzically.

"That was not what I saw first,—but a canvas bag and a good-sized stone-hammer, which she held out to me, exclaiming, 'Oh, I am so glad you are here, Mr. Sainton! You will carry these for me, I know. I am going to collect specimens for my cabinet, and you'll help me, I am sure. These ravines must be full of curious things. I've already seen three strange species of butterflies, and I am told there are plenty of trilobites where they are blasting; so I've brought—oh, if there isn't a,'—I cannot remember what she called it—some sesquipedalian word—but she dropped these things into my hands and set off after a green-looking thing, a sort of a cross between a katy-did and a devil's-darning-needle."

"Your scientific knowledge is improving," Max remarked admiringly, but received only a grim smile in reply as Arthur Sainton continued.

"Not for one moment that whole day did I find a chance to achieve my object. I followed her with bag, box and hammer; I chased the most despicable things that crawl or fly, and I hammered out trilobites, and cracked open every old bowlder we came across to see what was inside. She said it was an inexhaustible field. From my standpoint it was exhaustible, but I did not say so. All the time she kept up a voluble stream of information as to 'steats,' 'pockets,' 'capacity,' 'power' and the like, until a call from the party required her presence, when she went into ecstasies over her 'finds' and then we started for home."

"You are having a serious time in your laudable endeavor to prove your theory false; but I think you will succeed in time. She must have a heart; people have to have one to go into ecstasies, don't they?" The twinkle in Max's eye was exasperating.

"Max, you can't be sensible, I see. I really thought you would help me out."

"I can and will, to your individual comments. But you have not told me her name."

"Bierstadt—Jessie Bierstadt."

"Hum!" muttered Max, with a quick drop of the eyelids and a vigorous puff of smoke. "'Bierstadt' sounds rather Alpish, but 'Jessie' seems warmer. Yes," eyeing the blue rings, "I prophesy that your fair one has a heart—the omens are favorable to that theory. But let me ask what you will do with your own theory, if you find her possessed of such an organ?"

"Do! why—well—if I do find it true, I'll—oh, I don't know what I might not do."

"It is a desperate case I see; but I must leave you now. Don't let your scientific Medusa make a petrification of you before the tenth. You are due at my sister's place then, remember."

A little later Max sat in his own room penning a note to Mrs. Proctor, which read thus:

Dear Sis: Sainton and myself will be with you on the tenth; but what do you think? He is desperately infatuated with Jessie Bierstadt, but between his theories and her science he is having a distracting time of it. Can't you manage to have her down there minus her beloved ologies? He only wants a good opportunity to locate her heart. That's a good girl.

Yours, Max.

Jessie Bierstadt had just finished a brilliant electrical experiment, when a note from Mrs. Proctor reached her. It ran:

Dear Jessie: This is to remind you not to fail me on the tenth. I have one request to make of you, however; Do leave behind you that "monstrum, horrendum, informe, ingens" tin box, with all its appurtenances of cotton, chloroform, jute and poisons, and be your own sweet, warm-hearted self. I want you to efface the impression that you are heartlessly scientific.

Yours, Alice.

A queer smile flitted over Jessie's face, as she read this, and it had not wholly faded when she reached her own room, where she apostrophized herself before the mirror as follows:

"So, Jessie Bierstadt, you are heartless, are you! And what has made you appear so, I should like to know! It is not all your fault. But people don't know it all. Go! Of course you will, and if Mr. Sainton should be there"

She stopped abruptly, smiled and sighed, and went back to the laboratory to direct a series of blow-pipe experiments.

The tenth found a gay party assembled at Mrs. Proctor's hospitable summer home. The following two weeks were weeks of gayety and pleasure to the party generally, but of perplexity, vexation and despair to Arthur Sainton individually.

Walks, rides, sails, picnics, and amusements—all were favorable to every member of the party but himself. Jessie Bierstadt's voice might be heard in the gayest circle, conversing on topics suited to the occasion—the witticism and repartee, one of the most brilliant—but when he managed to find her alone for a moment the chat veered into a scientific channel as regularly as if he were the breeze which alone blew in that direction, and he would find himself inveighed into a chase after a butterfly, or digging for sayor shells on the beach, while she expatiated in glowing terms on their curious structure and habits.

After every such seance, the extraordinary part of it was, that his scientific companion held a private one of her own, in which she took herself to task in a most scientific fashion, ending with a few tears, and going down-stairs as coldly scientific as ever.

The days flitted by until but one more remained, for which a grand excursion had been planned, as a fitting climax—a ride to the Cliffs at Islet Bay, a clam-bake, and a moonlight yacht-sail home again.

"Unlimited opportunities, my boy!" said Max, that morning, clapping Arthur Sainton upon the shoulder, as he was directing the disposal of the huge hampers.

"If you do not discover the existence of Miss Bierstadt's auricles and ventricles to-day, I fear you never will."

"Why, man alive! I don't know what more I can do. I've tried every conceivable plan. Nothing seems to touch her. Possibly, she might manifest a little warmth if I should break my neck," he lugubriously answered.

Couldn't you manage to sprain it a little in her behalf? If that does not awaken a tenderness in the region where the heart is supposed to be, you may as well abandon the search to a government expedition, well provisioned for arctic regions."

"I don't know—I'll try," was the absent-minded response.

Mrs. Proctor, too, was fully alive to the fact that nothing had yet come of her plans. If Arthur Sainton's theories had troubled her at first, that trouble was nothing compared to what Jessie Bierstadt's line of conduct gave her. She could not resist giving one more word of warning, as she found her alone in the dining room.

"Jessie, you are the most provoking person I ever saw. Now, listen to me. If you do not make yourself less of a sphynx to-day, I wash my hands of your whole future happiness."

"That means I am not to propound any riddles, I suppose. I'll promise at least not to devour any who do not solve them."

"It means you are to cease being a riddle yourself. Jessie, have you any heart at all!" Her tone changed to one of entreaty.

"I always supposed so, Alice. In fact, I must have, or the circulation"—

"You are incorrigible!" exclaimed Mrs. Proctor, and she turned away shortly.

A few hours later and the party was scattered over the cliffs which overhung the shingly beach at Islet Bay. After the contents of the hampers had been discussed, Arthur Sainton unblushingly told Miss Bierstadt that he believed she might find some new "specimens" a short distance up the beach, and they set out on this assurance. It was a full mile away, where he proposed a rest before descending the cliffs to the beach below. They were sitting at the very edge, looking upon the sea—he at her feet, gazing up into her eyes. In this situation he quoted, with meaning look,—

"'O summer day beside the joyous sea!
Forever and forever shalt thou be
To some the gravestones of a dead delight,
To some the landmark of a new domain.'

Jessie, I wonder which it will be to me, after to-day."

She could not mistake his meaning and she had the grace to blush, though she instantly exclaimed,—

"Do you know that it is the opinion of scientists that in two thousand years the sea will be rolling as many feet deep over this very spot!"

"No!" he impatiently exclaimed. "I wish it would roll that deep over this spot now; then you and I would be together forever to wander"—

"'Down to the caves in the sea,'

She sang merrily. "I have often wished I were a water-sprite, so I might 'sport' neath the billowy foam, and gather old ocean's lovely treasures. Then I might find a living sea-lily—they are so rare and so difficult to obtain uninjured, and I have always wanted to possess one." She clasped her hands laughingly.

He repressed a vehement ejaculation and half rising, said hurriedly, "Miss Bierstadt, Jessie, I would give all the flowers of the sea if you would—,"

"O, but sea-lilies are not flowers!" she naively exclaimed. "Ther are animals—crinoids—a species of Coelentera. The ancients found them fossil and called them stone-lilies—poor men! they did not know as much about science as we."

"Jessie Bierstadt!" springing to his feet, "you are a stone-lily yourself—fully petrified! What do I care about crinoids or any other olds? I must know now if you really have—"

"Oh—h!" ejaculated Jessie, interrupting him and peering anxiously over the cliff. "Mr. Sainton, I do believe there is a rare specie of Compositæ down there," pointing with her parasol to a starry blue flower hanging in a crevice just below. "Can't you get it for me? Oh, do, please!" She beamed upon him a particularly warm glance as she finished.

He was viciously digging the ground with his cane while she spoke. He looked at her a second, then suddenly said, "Yes, if I break my neck." And he added under his breath, as he threw down his cane, "I told Max I had done everything else, and here goes."

He turned and plunged recklessly down the steep side, holding by a few shrubs here and there. He reached the flower, when his foot slipped just as he clutched the blossom; the sudden force tore out the small shrub to which he clung, and he went rolling down to the rocks below.

Jessie was dazed for a moment. Then she drew one long breath, and snatching up the cane, with which to study her steps, she began the descent, carefully measuring every step, knowing well that to miss her footing might be fatal to both. At last she stood on the rocks below, and there, a few feet away, lay Arthur Sainton, motionless, and a red stream trickling over the stones. In a moment she was at his side, to find his arm had been severely cut on a sharp rock and was bleeding profusely. Quickly and deftly she made a tourniquet of handkerchief and the cane and applied it above the wound. As she saw the blood ceasing to flow she bore water in her straw hat and bathed his face and head. After unavailing attempts to bring him back to consciousness, she did a remarkable thing for a heartless woman to do—threw her arms about him and rained kisses on his white face, crying—,

"Arthur! Arthur! forgive me! Open your eyes, and live for my sake, or my heart will break!"

Perhaps it was mention of her heart, or it might have been the kisses, which brought back his senses. At any rates he opened his eyes, smiled, wrapped his uninjured arm around her, and faintly said, "My darling, have I found your heart at last!" Then he groaned, as the movement sent a sickening pain through his shoulder.

An hour or so later the party was surprised to see them walk into its midst, he pale and weak from the loss of blood and pain, and leaning upon her. It was not until all found themselves comfortably ensconced on board the yacht, homeward bound, the wound attended to by a convenient surgeon of the party, the sprained shoulder swathed in liniment-saturated handkerchiefs, and his head found to have sustained no severer injury than that of the scalp, that special inquiry was made concerning the accident.

"How on earth did you contrive to tumble over those cliffs!" quirled Max, the moment they were alone.

"Perhaps you remember advising me to sprain my neck, and I believe I said I would try. Well, I did the next thing to it,—sprained, my shoulder, with the rest. But I found her heart!" he ended, with a jubilant smile.

Ah! Didn't I prophesy that your icily fair one had a heart, after all? But how about the science and—"

"Bother your science!" Arthur snappishly interrupted. "Where would I have been if it had not been for the science! I'd have bled to death. Most women would have screamed or fainted, or something equally foolish, without trying, or even knowing, what to do."

"Oh!" Max meekly said, I meant no offence, but a fellow has to talk so to keep on the lee'ard side of your theories—"

"Theories!" Arthur glared savagely at his tormentor. "I haven't any, and I wouldn't have any but a scientific woman for a wife!"

"Now tell us how it happened, Jessie," Mrs. Proctor was asking, in behalf of the group of ladies, a short distance away.

"There is not much to tell," was her nonchalant reply. "Mr. Sainton lost his footing, trying to get this flower for my herbarium." As she spoke she critically examined the wilted, blue rayed blossom, which had been miraculously preserved, adding, "But it is not what I thought it to be."

"Humph! And you let him almost break his neck for that insignificant thing!"

The indignant matron gave her a withering glance and turned to the gentlemen in time to catch Arthur Sainton's closing sentence.

"Possible!" she exclaimed, as the truth burst upon her. "Jessie!" Flated as she was, she could not forbear. "Jessie, behold a man who declares every woman who 'dabbles in science' an 'ogress,—'cold and' "—

"Mrs. Proctor, I protest!" cried Arthur. "I foreswore those ideas long ago."

"Hush!" she returned authoritatively, with uplifted finger. "He even wretchedly paraphrased Goethe to clutch his stony statement."

"Yes," demurely responded Jessie, "The scientific phrases women are accustomed to repeat,"—

"You heard it!" was the simultaneous interruption from both Mrs. Proctor and Arthur Sainton.

"A silken portiere not being a non-conductor of sound, I could not do otherwise than hear; and as I was even then 'dabbling' in the objectionable subject, I concluded"—

"To give me a lesson, I see, and you have in a most coldly scientific fashion. So my theory was a pure figment of my own brain at the very first!" He braced himself up by his elbow.

"You recant, then!" cried Mrs. Proctor.

"Recant! Everything! What blind unreasoning idiots we can make of ourselves when we try! Goethe knew best. 'The scientific phrases men are accustomed to repeat incessantly end by becoming convictions which ossify the organs of intelligence.'"

"And when a man is brought to the humiliating depths of such a confession," said Max, drawing his sister away, "Requiescat in pace."—Yankee Blade.

Explained.

In the first quarter of this century a party of travelers was journeying down the Missouri on a flat boat. The river was covered with floating ice, and provisions were scarce, but the men were young, possessed of much more wit than money, and able to extract plenty of fun out of the danger and privation.

One evening two of them, a schoolteacher and a Frenchman, whose occupation nobody could discover, went ashore to buy provisions at a farmhouse. The teacher offered half a dollar to the farmer's wife for a motherly old hen that was scratching about the yard. She refused with a torrent of abuse.

His comrade, who was lounging over the gate, whispered, "Offer another bit."

"Five bits!" said the teacher.

The woman hesitated, when to her amazement, the hen squeaked out;

"I'm not worth it!"

The teacher started back in dismay; the farmer's wife, regaining her courage, chased the hen and caught it up in her arms.

"Take two bits! It's all I'm worth!" it said, flapping wildly in her arms.

She ran, pale with terror, to the Frenchman, and put it in his hands, screaming out, "Take it away! It's bewitched!"

The young men threw the money back to her, and carried off the hen.

Many years afterwards, among the crowd in the east room of the White House which attended one of the receptions of President Fillmore, was the kindly old Signor Blitz, well known to all the children of the eastern states as a ventriloquist. When he was introduced to the president, the two men looked at each other a moment, and then burst into a laugh.

"You never thought to see me here," said Mr. Fillmore. "Now, for the first time, I understand the mystery of the old hen!"—Youth's Companion.

How One Burglar Was Caught.

The Irish have a little invention which has been used in Ireland with great success. It would be a good attachment for the ballot-boxes in this country. An enterprising burglar entered a gentleman's house at Waterford, Ireland, one night a couple of weeks ago, and, after purloining everything he could find, he prepared to remove a large photograpic camera that was standing on a table. In some way he touched off a magnesium flash light attachment that was part of the machine and fled precipitately when the thing flared up. The next day it was discovered that the camera had taken the photograph of the burglar. The negative was placed in the hands of the police and by its aid they quickly nabbed their man. It showed the burglar with a jimmy in one hand and a box containing jewelry under his arm, while he carried a sack over his shoulder with valuable pieces of plate, books, etc., and was gazing at the flash light in open-mouthed amusement. This was the unimpeachable evidence of a mechanical eye-witness and the fellow was sent up for six months.—Manchester Courier.

A Royal Baby.

Probably the magnificent state of the royal baby of Spain surpasses that of any other infant of Western lands, but the retinue of the Emperor of China show how they do such things in the East. The list of his attendants was as follows:

Eighty nurses.
Twenty-five fan bearers.
Twenty-five palanquin bearers.
Ten umbrella bearers.
Thirty physicans and surgeons.
Seven cooks.
Twenty-three assistant cooks.
Fifty servants and messengers.
Fifty dressers (to put on and take off the imperial clothes.)
Seventy-five astrologers.
Sixteen governors.
Sixty priests.

A little book of more than ordinary interest has just been published by Col. Hans Mattson. It relates to the 250th anniversary of the Swedish settlements in America and contains valuable historical information from old colonial times. There is in it a fine picture of the old Swedes' church at Wilmington, Del., one of the most valuable antiquities in the country.

The eloquent and instructive address delivered on the occasion by Hon. W. W. Thomas, Jr., is also given in full; and Hon. Pennock Pusey, for many years a well known citizen of this state but now a resident at Wilmington, contributes a most interesting and finely written historical sketch of the Swedes in both hemispheres. Less voluminous, though hardly inferior in interest, are several letters from persons in some way indentified with the history and fate of the Delaware Swedes. Prominent among these, is the present secretary of state, Hon. T. F. Bayard, who, with feeling and evident pleasure, refers to the many ties that link himself and his family to the Swedish settlements on the Delaware. The secretary indeed traced his ancestry on the maternal side back to a Swedish lady who married Joseph Willing, an Englishman from Bristol who owned the land on which the first Swedish settlement was made, and from whom the present city of Wilmington derives its name.

The book is neatly gotten up, and in order to defray the cost of publication a limited number will be offered for sale. Every student of American history should read the book, and it ought to be preserved in the libraries of the country.

It will be sent, post paid, on receipt of $1 per copy, or of $5 for six. Orders should be addressed to Col. H. Mattson, Capitol, St. Paul, Minn.

FOR THE BLOOD
S. S. S.
Swift's Specific has cures me of a malignant breaking out on my leg, which caused intolerable pain. It was called Eczema by the doctors—four of whom treated me with no relief. I candidly confess that I owe my present good health to S. S. S., which in my estimation is invaluable as a blood remedy.

Jabez Kyle's Ruse.

BY J. L. MC'CARTY.

"Ha! ha!" chuckled old Jabez Kyle, "it's an excellent idea—excellent. I'll do it—do it this very day. I'll test em—test my dear relatives and see for myself how much I can depend on em if things ever came to a pinch. He! he! I'll see how much they really care for old Jabez. He! he! an excellent idea—exellent."

And old Jabez Kyle chuckled gleefully and rubbed his long, thin hands together. He was an old man, was Jabez Kyle, quite old; sixty he would have told you himself without a moment's hesitation if you asked him, with a face and figure that bore ample proofs of his age. His hair was long and quite gray and his face was gaunt and as yellow as parchment. His eyes were blue and piercing and were deep-set beneath a pair of shaggy, gray eyebrows. His lips were thin and bloodless, and firm and determined in expression, and when parted in laughter, disclosed a set of yellow, fang like teeth. But as old as Jabez Kyle was, he was hardy and strong withal, and bid fair to live a great many years yet, weak as he looked. Jabez Kyle lived in a pleasant little town in the state of California, and was one of the wealthiest men in the place. He resided on one of the finest farms in the neighborhood which he owned, and the product of which brought him an ample income. He was unmarried and had neither kith nor kin living with him, nobody but his housekeeper, and a few servants and farm laborers. Jabez possessed considerable other property besides his farm—property in real estate, railroad bonds and mining stock which some of his knowing townsmen hinted, brought him to the rank of a millionaire. But Jabez Kyle's fellow-townspeople did not know much about him or his affairs, and what knowledge they did have of either was of the meagerest description. A closer and more uncommunicative man than Jabez Kyle never lived. His townsmen had no knowledge of Jabez having a relative in the whole world. During his residence among them, a period which embraced the greater part of his life, they had never heard or seen any relation belonging to him, and it is upon them that my story hinges.

Jabez Kyle had not always lived in the little California town in which I introduce him to the reader, although forty years of his life had been spent there. He had been born and brought up in a Massachusetts village, but at the age of twenty, tiring of his native place, he had left it to seek fortune in California, where gold had been discovered and which was the El Dorado of every adventurer in search of wealth. How Jabez had succeeded in his search for wealth my readers have seen. He kept his good fortune to himself and held little or no communication with his relatives in the east, although he received many letters from them in answer to the one epistle he had sent home soon after achieving wealth in his new home, informing them of the fact. Of late years, however, these letters, which were full of affection and good wishes for Jabez, had increased, and Jabez thought it would be an excellent idea for him to put the writers to a test and see if their love for him was real or pretended. The manner in which he meant to accomplish this was as follows: He would write each of his relatives in the old Bay State a letter, pretending he had lost all his money and was quite poor, requesting their assistance. In this way he had no doubt he could discover whether their professions of love and esteem were sincere or not. This was the "excellent idea" alluded to in the opening paragraph of this story, which Jabez promised to do "this very day." It was an eccentric scheme, but then Jabez Kyle was an eccentric man—far more eccentric than his neighbors had thought. When Jabez Kyle made up his mind to do a thing he lost no time in doing it. Accordingly the next day he locked himself in a room in his farmhouse which he used as an office and set about writing the letters. The work occupied about an hour and when it was completed and all the letters written out from a list of names in Jabez's possession, he took the bundle of letters and donning hat and coat, repaired to the post office. Inserting the missives in the mail-box, Jabez retraced his steps homeward, meeting nobody on the way.

"A good joke," chuckled Jabez, as he rubbed his hands in glee. "Now we'll wait and see how things'll turn out."

"A letter for me, Mrs. Blaz[illegible]alo?" said Veronica Kyle. "Why, who ever can it be from?"

"I don't know, miss, I'm sure," answered the good-natured landlady. "It came in the afternoon mail."

Veronica Kyle took the letter which her landlady extended to her and bent her foot-steps up-stairs to her room on the second floor. She did not receive, as a rule, many letters, and she did not expect any just then. She was a remarkably pretty girl, was Veronica Kyle, like the majority of the shop-girls of Boston. She had a plump, handsome figure, the graceful, pleasing lines of which her plain, but well-fitting dress displayed to advantage. Her complexion was a delicate pink and white, and her eyes were large, luminous, and as blue as the skies of June. Her mouth was small, with ripe, red lips and even, snow-white teeth. Her head was crowned with a growth of rich, dark-brown hair, which she always wore in a tasty and becoming manner. She was employed as a saleswoman, at not very magnificent wages, in a large dry-goods house on Summer street. Marveling much who her unknown correspondent could be, and so impatient was she to learn that she broke it open before taking off her wraps and exposed to view the following letter:

My Dear Niece Veronica—I hope you will excuse the liberty I take in writing you this letter, but stern necessity compels me to do it. I am very poor and sadly in need of assistance immediately. As you know, perhaps, I was once quite rich, but unfortunate investments and other embarrassments have swept away all my money, and I am now, alas! as poor as ever, and not only that, but I am old and feeble as well, unable to toil and struggle as I once did. You are young and strong and better able to fight the battle of life than I, who am old and weak. Trusting, therefore, that you will not turn a deaf ear to an old man's appeal, I am, my dear niece,

Your affectionate uncle, Jabez Kyle.

To Miss Veronica Kyle.

"Poor, Uncle Jabez!" sighed Veronica. "I often heard poor papa speak of him. Well, I'll do what I can for poor uncle, although I won't be able to do much." And she glanced with a sigh around the plainly-furnished little apartment, the rent of which, with the small bed-room leading to it, and the necessaries of life, her slender wages barely sufficed to pay. Veronica had never seen Jabez Kyle; she had been born long after he had settled in California, but she often heard her parents, now dead, speak of him, he being her father's brother. Jabez Kyle's appeal did not fall on a deaf ear. Shortly afterwards Veronica Kyle, who was as good as she was beautiful, dispatched a letter to Jabez in answere to his, commiserating his misfortunes and enclosing a five dollar bill to relieve his immediate necessities and promising to send more when she could. Poor girl! Small as the sum was, she had stinted herself greatly to be able to send it.

* * * * * *

"Any letters for me, Mr. Lane?" asked Jabez Kyle, addressing the local postmaster about a month after he had sent the letter.

"Why, yes, Mr. Kyle," replied the official, "quite a number," and he passed out several letters to old Jabez, glancing at him with some curiosity as he did so. Like all his kind, the postmaster was very inquisitive, and he would have liked to pry into Jabez's affairs if he could, especially as he wondered very much why Jebez suddenly received such an unusual amount of correspondence.

Paying no attention to him, Jabez took his mail and a moment more was seated in his private room at the farm house examining it. The letters were five in number and Jabez had expected more, but as he anticipated, some of his letters had not been answered by the recipients. With a grim smile Jabez selected a letter and opened it.

"From cousin Hezekiah Blossom," said Jabez, with a chuckle, when he had finished its perusal, "says he is sorry but can do nothing for me. Says he has enough to do to make his own living, and that when I had money I ought to have held on to it. He! he! this from good cousin Hezekiah whose letters were so full of affection for me—when he thought I was a rich man."

He laughed bitterly, and opened another letter.

"From cousin Miranda Blossom, in Strawberryville, Massachusetts," chuckled Jabez, when he had read the letter. "Says she can do nothing for me, as she has a husband and ten children of her own who are nearer to her than a mere distant cousin, such as she says I am. Says that her letters to me were caused from cousinly friendship anyway, and will cease from this out. She advises me to apply to the town authoities for relief, and hints that a second letter to her on this subject will be unanswered. He! he! he! nice talk from cousin Miranda, who has $50,000 in her own right and who thought so much of me—under other circumstances." Casting the letter aside he opened another.

"From cousin Ezekiel Barrows," smiled Jabez, "He! he! says that I have his heartfelt sympathy, and tells me not to murmur at heaven's will. He enclosed some religious tracts, peculiarly adapted to the aged, which he trusts I will read with interest and advantage. Says that he has no money to spare at present, his heavy contributions to the many foreign missions taking all his odd cash. He! he! this from good, pious cousin Ezekiel. He! he! he!"

Jabez opened a fourth letter. It was from a cousin named Priscilla Sidebottom, a maiden lady whom Jabez knew to be quite wealthy and who had been the most affectionate of all his relations. Her letter was much the same as the others. She was very sorry for Jabez, but had no money to spare for him. She was poor enough herself, she wrote, not one quarter as well off as folks imagined. She had enough to do to do for herself, she said, and it was totally impossible for him to expect any assistance from her. She concluded by recommending him to go to the poorhouse.

Jabez threw the letter from him in disgust and picked up the fifth and last letter. This was from Veronica Kyle. Jabez opened it with a sarcastic grin on his gaunt, sallow face.

"From niece Veronica in Boston," commented he. "Ho! ho! some starving shop-girl or school teacher, I suppose, whose slender wages barely keep her in gewgaws and finery. He! he! I won't get much out of her."

But as he opened the letter, to his amazement a crisp five-dollar bill dropped out of it. If Jabez Kyle had really been in the condition he had represented himself to be to his relatives he could not have seized that five dollars with more eagerness than he did. He gazed at it as a poor author would gaze at a check from his publisher, and when he had recovered from his surprise, he hastily read the letter which accompanied it. The letter was brief, and in it Veronica told her uncle how sorry she was for him in his misfortune and informing him how she enclosed a little money for him, as much as she could spare at present. Then in a burst of girlish confidence she told him all about herself. How she was engaged to a young man named Leslie Thorne, employed in the same store with her and how they were to be married in a short time. She concluded by promising to write to him shortly. Jabez Kyle stared at the letter like one in a dream.

"Well, who would have thought it," he said; then looking at the other missives scattered about, a frenzy of rage took possession of him.

"Oh, the mean, base, hypocritical hounds!" he cried, alluding to his double-faced relatives; "the lying dogs! pretending they are poor and unable to help anyone, men and women that could spare a hundred dollars and never miss it, while this poor girl whom I have never seen sends me what she can out of her slender means. Pretending an affection for me which they never meant when they thought I was rich and wanted nothing from them. The miserable, low, time-serving hounds!"

Then as his eyes fell on Veronica Kyle's letter again a softened expression came over his hard visage.

"Well, who would have thought it?" he murmured, gazing through the windows at a range of blue mountains dimly discernible in the distance, and brushing a suspicious moisture from his eyes. "Who—would—have—thought it?"

* * * * * *

Great was Veronica Kyle's astonishment when a few days later she received a second letter from Jabez Kyle, enclosing the money which she had sent him, together with a railroad ticket to his residence in California, requesting her to come to him at once. She did so, and Jabez adopted her as his daughter, and she lived like a duchess. Jabez made his will in which he left the bulk of his property to his niece. And it was well that he did so, for a week later Jabez Kyle was thrown from a horse and instantly killed.

When his affairs were settled up after the funeral, it was found that he was immensely wealthy, far more so than any of his neighbors had dreamed, and it was all bequeathed to his beloved niece, Veronica, whom he termed a relative to be proud of. Veronica is now married to the man of her choice, Leslie Thone, and they are living happily on the farm. As for Jabez Kyle's other relatives they never knew the test their eccentric relative had put them to, and the golden opportunity they had lost forever. They had proved themselves false, while Veronica had proved herself true, and won the golden reward which true charity ever merits.—Yankee Blade.

Between the Lines.

It was such a discreet little letter,
Not formal enough to be cold,
Not fond enough to encourage
The reader to love and be bold.

It held him at right proper distance,
No sweet words or dead give-away,
Yet somehow it filled him with gladness
And brightened the whole prosy day.

For he read her love all unspoken,
And he had the assurance to write:
"My dearest, expect me at Lakewood
On the late train Saturday night."

Then he said that day in the office
He should take a week out of town,
That his sister was off in the country,
And he "really must make a run down."

O, happy the lover whose sweetheart,
Tho' prudent and shy she may be,
Leaves hid 'neath the lines of her letter
Some message he only can see!

Told by Warde.

Warde tells a good story. It is, I suppose, a chestnut. I never heard a theatrical story that was not. What proves it to be an old one is that Warde names the place it occurred. He was playing Virginius in some small place. You will remember that Appius Claudius' client, who does the dirty work, comes on in the last act, has a few words with Appius Claudius in prison and then goes off. That is the last that is seen of him in the play. When the curtain fell on this performance of Virginius in this small place, Warde retired to his dressing room and proceeded to become the Frederick Warde of every-day life. The manager came in.

"Mr. Warde, the audience has not gone."

"Well, I can't help that. The play is done. There isn't any more of it in the book."

"But they don't go."

"Turn down the footlights."

"No use. They won't stir. Won't you go and speak to them?"

"What! Go and tell them the play's over? Egad—I will. That will be a funny experience."

Warde stepped in front of the curtain; there the audience sat quite still.

"Ladies and gentlemen, the play is over. Virginia is dead, Dentatus is dead; I am dead; Appius Claudius is dead."

Just then a voice sang out from the gallery:

"What did you do with that other son of a gun?"—San Francisco Chronicle.

The Inconsistency of Woman.

Woman (to tramp): "I don't see how you kin eat in such hot weather, I don't swallow enough to keep a bird alive." Tramp (putting away the last morsel): "Madam, poor people have to put up with a great deal." Woman: "I s'pose so. Now, can't you saw a little wood?" Tramp (reproachfully): "Madam, if you think it is too hot to eat it is certainly too hot to saw wood—woman is nothing if not inconsistent."—Epoch.

A Long Time Between Drinks.

Col. Blood (angrily to waiter): "I say, waiter, didn't I tell you to bring me another cocktail?" Waiter: "Yes, sah; yes, sah. I'll be there directly." Col. Blood: "Well, hurry up. I want you to understand that I'm no camel."—New York World.

TOO MANY GOVERNORS.

A Western Convention Where Every Seat Held a Delegate.

The large number of political conventions has reminded me of one of the first "State" conventions held in Dakota, writes Fred H. Carruth in the New York Tribune. The territory was not, of course, a state, but that didn't hinder the politicians from holding a state convention once in awhile and putting in nomination a full state ticket, so in case congress should admit the territory the officers would be all ready to take their seats and begin drawing their pay.

At this convention some trouble was experienced in effecting an organization, as there were eleven candidates for chairman, but it was finally accomplished by embracing an opportunity when eight of them had gone to take a drink with one of the candidates for secretary of state, and combining on one and electing him. Other routine work took up the day, and it was not till evening that the nomination of state officers was begun.

General White, the chairman, called the convention to order by pounding on the desk with a slung-shot covered with fine stamped leather, and poured out a glass of water and took a drink of it. The fine sense of humor possessed by the audience was so touched by this that it (the audience) broke into an applause which lasted nearly five minutes, the chairman meanwhile smiling and looking at the water still remaining in the glass with a somewhat perplexed air, when order was finally restored by General White appointing an investigation committee to see what the liquid was. Nominations for governor were called for, and Colonel Joe Reynolds presented the name of Senator A. H. Ransome; Major Hill that of Governor George Bird, Judge Dean Decker that of Hon. Jap Powers, Lieutenant Judkins that of Colonel Mixter, Commodore Harney that of Judge Tipton, and Senator Peoples that of Major Poindexter. Several others were casually mentioned without having speeches made in their behalf.

It was rumored on the convention floor that there were a few other candidates coming outside on the run.

There was a great uproar all the way through and when it partially subsided it was found that Dr. Dave Skinner, of Starvhorse county, had got the sheet-iron drum of the stove just about word out by pounding on it with an old pump-handle. A candidate for judge of the supreme court, while applauding the name of Colonel Mixter, slipped up and fell on his back, injuring himself so that he had to be removed from the hall and carried to the bar-room of his hotel on a door. Governor Whitney, one of the oldest men in the convention, and extremely dignified, also got into a personal altercation near the middle of the hall with a man from Custer county, who was a candidate for state treasurer, and before they could be seperated the governer had his coat torn off and watch chain broken. The old gentleman would, however, have reduced the number of prospective state treasurers if they had let him alone, as he had the man from Custer down, and was yelling wildly and jumping on him with both feet when pulled off.

Vic Smith, of Sentinel Butte, had just announced that the convention seemed unable to agree on its candidate for governor, he had the names of three new candidates which he would take pleasure in presenting, when General Climber, who had come to the territory from Missouri in 1862 got the floor and said:

"Mr. Chairman: Allow me to say a word. If we go on this way we shall have more governors than we know what to do with. Instead of one chief executive we shall have a crowd reaching from Jim river to Sundown. Gentlemen, when the stranger from the wornout east comes among us and looks at our state house, which we expect to erect, and sees the feet of men sticking out of the windows, and asks in inquiring tones: 'Who are them gilderflukes with the feet?' we shall have to answer him: 'state governors.'

"When the hardy settler on our broad and fertile prairies rises from his bed after a night of sweet and dewy repose, and, drawing aside the window curtain, looks out across the gray landscape toward where the sun, in his splendor, is coming up out of the golden Orient, his astonished gaze will be met by four long, gray streaks hurrying through the morning light on the dead run! Governors, gentlemen, rushing to the capital to take the oath of office!

"Governors will jostle us on the streets; we shall throw a stone at a hen and kill a governor; special trains will jump off the track and take a short cut for the capital to let a delegation of governors in on the ground floor.

"Our towns will be deserted and our fields lay barren while the people will be off waiting to get into a capital building to act as governors, where governors already stick out of the transoms.

"In that solemn hour, gentlemen, when all they hope to meet, in that hour when the least of these unto the greater hopes to come together, each with all the others, in that sweetly sad time—I refer, my friends, to when they assemble at the treasury to draw their pay—at that time there won't be two bits apiece for them.

"Gentlemen, do we want to elect such a swarm of governors? Shall we depopulate this fair land for the sake of being able to say that our highest executive office can muster more men than the standing army? When one of our legislative bills is signed do we want to have to paste a roll of wall paper to it to accommodate the signatures of the governors? Would it not be better, my friends, to throw overboard all these numerous and light weight gentlemen who aspire to the office, and elect some large, brainy, able, scholarly, patriotic, dignified, polished and popular man and try to scrub such along with him as our governor? I know a man, peculiarly endowed by farseeing nature for the office; a man to whom the finger of fate has ever pointed and said: 'There is the man for the first state governor of Dakota!' Gentlemen, friends, fellow citizens, I refer to myself! I present to you the name of old General Jesse Climber, known from Pembina to the Cheyenne Crossing and from Little Muddy to Yankton Flat, as the squarest man that ever looked through a collar! Straight as a greenback, gentlemen, and able as a two-year-old steer! Never licked in a fair fight and in the race to stay till the hide of the last opponent is hung on the fence!"

When the gentleman sat down, which he did on the back of a chair with his feet on the seat, there was applause which caused the floor to break down in one corner and let three candidates for state auditor down into the saloon below.

By splitting the top of the table in a couple of places with the slung-shot, the chairman finally restored order. A vote was called for, and General Climber insisted on voting first, regardless of any alphabetical arrangements, and cast the vote for himself. Others followed, and he was nominated almost unanimously, and of course afterward elected, as the statehood uprising was a general rather than a party movement, and there was no other ticket in the field. The defeated candidates for governor were pacified by each being given something else; and by the creation of several new offices, such as second assistant state treasurer, state veterinary surgeon, state superintendent of election frauds, etc., enough were provided to go around and there were no bitter disappointments left to rankle in the bosoms of the defeated. The committee on the restriction of liquor selling then reported, recommending as its mojority report for high license, and stating that Judge Perkins, of the committee, wished to submit a minority report in favor of rigid prohibition, but that unfortunately the judge had imbibed a little too freely, and would not probably be able to stand on his feet and use parliamentary language fluently before the next morning, or possibly the day after. A motion to adjourn was then carried and the members went down and joined the three candidates for auditor who had gone through the floor.

Speech for a Little boy.

I'm going to be a wise man,
As you may plainly see;
If I do all the good I can,
There'll be a place for me.

I know that I am very small,
I'm scarcely three feet high;
But then, when I am big and tall,
Won't I be smart? Oh, my!

So then, I must my lessons get,
My teachers kind obey;
I never must get cross and fret,
But pleasant be each day.

Wishing that we may all do right,
I ask to be excused;
I'll bid you all a kind good-night,
Hoping you've been amused.

IN STRANGE QUARTERS.

A Large Seal Killed in the Charles River, Massachusetts.

Two Watertown young men were reclining on the bank of the Charles river in that town yesterday afternoon, says the Boston Herald, when they observed a large head that appeared to be the head of a seal moving slowly up the stream. They immediately notified Daniel L. Keef, who lives in the vicinity. Keefe took down his rifle, hastened down to the river bank, and found that the seal had gone up stream about one hundred yards from where it was first seen. Taking a careful aim he fired at the seal's head and immediately the large animal sank out of sight. Jumping into his boat he pulled out to the spot where the seal had gone down and succeeded with considerable difficulty in pulling it up out of the water, which at that place was only two or three feet deep. Getting it into his boat he rowed back to his boat-house and landed it there.

An examination of the animal showed that the billet from the rifle had gone directly into the seal's eyes and through the head, killing him instantly. It measured four feet six inches from the tip of its nose to the end of its tail, was about a foot across its back and weighed nearly 150 pounds. Mr. Keefe stripped it of its skin, which is heavy brown and hairy, and is quite valuable. He proposes to have a vest made of it, and will bury the body of the seal. A large crowd of people visited his boat-house yesterday afternoon and last evening, and Mr. Keefe very naturally took a great deal of pride in his handsome capture, for the animal was truly a handsome one and an excellent specimen of its species. It is the first one ever known to have been in the Charles river, and its presence so far up stream as Watertown—the head of the tide-water—can hardly be understood, and can only be accounted for on the ground that the seal unwittingly floated into the river and up stream with the incoming tide.

In Mourning, Anyway.

"Mandy," exclaimed the elderly aunt of the young lady at the seaside, as she surveyed her in amazement, "your bathing costume shocks me! Remember you have not yet laid aside your mourning."

"That's all right, aunty," said Amanda, reassuringly, "you know I am quite dark-skinned."—Chicago Tribune.

THE NEW YORK GIRL.

One of the "Great" Ones Who Gave a Dude His Due.

The girl part of New York is great There is every kind of girl there that has ever been made, could be made, or would like to be made, and a few of them at least are somewhat curious creatures.

The average girl is generally pleased at the admiring glance besowed upon her as she trips her high-heeled way up Broadway or Fifth avenue, according to her business. The Fifth avenue walker usually tips her dainty nose a trifle higher at the glance, but nevertheless a little flutter of pleasure thrills through her as she thinks—"another."

Girls who make a practice of walking on Broadway until they are thoroughly well known, who dress conspicuously, and although not fast in the entire sense of the word, endeavor to attract attention should not be surprised if they are spoken to by men who are ready to admire and make fools of themselves over each pretty face they see. That sort of thing is not to be wondered at when the men are sufficiently encouraged, but unhappily, many sensible, well-behaved girls have, to suffer too. It is a pity that the "working girl" is ever pretty, for her beauty is often her ruin. She is subject to much annoyance from men, as her hours for being on the street are early and late. However, they soon become used to it, and are able to choke off the advances of the would-be mashers.

One of the exceptionally pretty girl clerks of Stearns's while going home the other evening, was thus accosted by the sweetest dudelot:

"Ah! good evening."

"Good evening," she replied.

"Nice evening," he said.

"Nice evening," she replied. Then she looked at him a moment and said in a solemn voice. "Let me give you a pit of good advice; you go home and tell your mother to wash your face, spank you well and put you to bed." The dude looked much hurt, and let her go her own way in peace.—New York Graphic.

GOT THEIR BALL BACK.

Return to English Artillerymen of a Shot Fired During the Revolution.

June 17, 1775, a British man-of-war lying in the Mystic river threw a cannon ball at the little American army intrenched on Bunker Hill. The ship threw more than one ball, but this particular one was picked up after the fight and saved. The other day, at the 250th anniversary of the Boston Ancient and Honorable Artillery company, this veritable ball was returned to a party of British artillerymen who had come over to help celebrate the occasion. The presentation was made at the dinner by Colonel Walker. "I hold in my hand," said Colonel Walker, "a cannon ball thrown by a British ship of war at the patriot army on Bunker Hill, June 17, 1775. Through the kindness of Mr. Hassam, who gives it to this company to present to you. I give it to you to carry home as a memento" (handing the cannon ball to Major Durrant amid hearty cheers and applause). "It was thrown at us in war. We give it to you in peace as as a token of the amity which lives to-day between our great nations, and which we all pray may live forever." "There is time for wonderful changes in a hundred years," says the New Haven Palladium, in commenting on the above. "It would have given the grizzled old fighters of the British war ship a queer feeling if they could have known, when they 'touched her off' and sent that ball screeching at the Yankee breastworks on that June day, 1775, that a hundred years later the ball would be handed back over a friendly dinner table as a token of amity and concord between the two greatest and most enlightened powers of the earth."—Army and Navy Register, New York.

Scenes at a Depot.

There is no place on God's footstool where any more ludicrous scenes are witnessed than at a metropolitan receptacle for the weary traveler or the gay tourist, as the case may be. One of a touching as well as of a laughable character is that of a parent as he or she will hastily disengage themselves from their offspring and insanely chase the tinkling bell of a switch engine, and after performing several antics of a saw-dust nature, find they are following a piece of a freight train instead of a train alloted to human freight. They will then with a crestfallen visage, resembling that of pressed tin, headlessly wend their way back to the not over fragrant waiting room.

The depot of a metropolitan city, where many railroads center, is one of a combination of piety, thievery, wantonness and refinement, with a fifty grain capsule of squalor added. The tainted odor of bilge water and seaweed paints a vivid chromo before one's nostrils of the steerage and Castle Garden. There are also heartrending scenes as the iron horse majestically and proudly snorts as he enters the passengers' refuge. There can be seen on the thickly dotted platform by the trained eye of the trainman the wan and tearful features of a sorrow stricken mother as she anxiously and with a nervous tread approaches the baggage car to see the casket that contains the remains of her poor and only boy, who met a horrible death in a distant city, removed. It is a sad sight, one to be ever remembered.

Just the Same.

Old Jenkins happened to meet his three young nieces and asked them to have a little refreshment. "Girls are just the same," said the old man, as he stood at the cashier's desk and picked up $2.85 out of a $20 bill; "very little change!"—Life.

An Error Corrected.

The average American liver is always more or less out of order. There are all manner of remedies for regulating livers, and yet the country is full of unregulated livers that refuse to run on schedule time.

The liver affects the intellectual parts of man. It is the liver, and not the heart, that is really the seat of sentiment, of love, of chivalry, and of all good and evil emotions. The condition of a man's liver colors and affects all his acts. A man may have ever so warm a heart, and it may be in the right place, but let his liver be out of order and he will kick the first harmless yellow dog he meets.

We often hear of a man harboring malice in his heart. The statement is not correct. All malice resides in the liver. Nine men in ten have malicious livers. All murderers have damaged and disabled livers. This is a fact that will soon be heralded abroad by the medical profession, and then the day will come when instead of the monotonous insanity plea, the lawyer for the defense will claim that the deed was done while the prisoner was laboring under a fit of temporary derangement of the liver. If Solomon had lived in these unhealthy times, instead of speaking as he did about the heart, he would have said: "The liver of man is deceitful above all things, and desperately overcharged with bile."

When the preacher draws gloomy pictures of woe, it is his liver that is out of order. When the philosopher predicts calamities and disaster that are about to fall on the people, it is the hinges of his liver that needs oiling. When our old friend "Taxpayer" writes a letter to the local papers in which he blasphemes monopolies, and demonstrates that the country is misgoverned and is going to the demnition "bow-wows," old Taxpayer means well, but the lappels of his liver are turned the wrong way. When a politician gets on his feet in the House of Representatives and denounces the policy of the opposition as "criminal and hurtful to the best interests of the people," his liver is in need of repairs. When a man gets cranky and rails at fate, or refuses to pay his dog tax, we should not judge him harshly; his liver may have got jammed in among some of his other organs.

When science shall have so far advanced that the liver of man will be under control, then, and not till then, will the millennium dawn.—Texas Siftings.

A French Love Charm.

"In the south of France they make a very peculiar love charm in a peculiar way. Under certain ceremonies which I did not understand very well the young woman catches and boxes up a frog in a box with a lot of little holes bored in the wood. The casket is then buried in an ant hill and left there for two weeks. The ants of course attack the prisoner and eat up all his flesh, and all that is left is the creature's bones. Among these is a shield-shaped bone about as large as one's thumb nail, upon one end of which is a little hook. The girl takes this bone and has it blessed surreptitiously by the priest without his knowledge—that is, she exposes it during the benediction at the mass—and when she hooks it on the clothing of her sweetheart that is to be. I was gravely assured that the charm, when properly prepared with all due ceremony and care, had never been known to fail."—Ben T. Allen, Chicago.

Price of Wild Animals.

The price paid for animals varies very much. A good male lion is worth $1,000, and a tiger $1,200; leopards cost $360; for monkeys we pay from $10 upward, according to their species. Ordinary East India or African monkeys of rare species cost as high as $30, $40 and $50 each.

The best speaking parrots are either the African or Mexican yellow head. For young birds of this species the dealers pay $10 apiece, when buying a number at a time, retailing them at $15 and $20 each. The old talking birds of this variety are worth from $50 to $100 apiece, the price depending upon the number of words the parrot can talk.—Epoch.

A Brussels lace merchant had received from a Belgian, residing in Paris, an order for a quantity of Malines lace. The goods were carefully packed in a lead coffin, which was dispatched to the Paris address as containing a corpse. The Paris merchant had to wait so long for the arrival of the "body" that he at length complained to the manager of the Northern Railway, who informed him that the coffin had been detained at the frontier owing to the noncompliance with certain prescribed formalities relating to the transmission of corpses. The merchant at once took train to Quievrain, dressed in solemn black and with a mourning band round his hat, and wearing an expression of profound sadness. But in spite of his emphatic protest against such an act of desecration the officials insisted on opening the coffin when the truth came to light and the ingenious smuggler was taken into custody.

THE NEWS RESUME.

The Cream of the News Gleaned From the Latest Associated Press Telegrams.

About Washington.

A national convention of colored Catholics, composed of delegates from nearly all of the colored Catholic churches and societies throughout the country met in the St. Augustine Colored Catholic church in Washington. Every seat in the church was occupied when Father Talton of Quincy, Ill., the only colored Catholic priest in the United States, began the celebration of solemn high mass. Immediately in front of and beneath the pulpit sat Cardinal Gibbons, who delivered the sermon. He was clad in the scarlet robe of his office. At the conclusion of the sermon the cardinal welcomed the delegates. "This gathering," said he, "will mark an era in the history of the United State, for never before have colored Catholics of the country met in convention. He trusted that the deliberations of the convention would be marked by moderation and discretion. Every one had the opportunity to kiss the cardinal's ring.

The Casualty Calendar.

The steamboat Natchez, owned by Thomas P. Leathers, struck a snag near Lake Providence on the Mississippi and was beached in shallow water on the opposite side of the river. She cost $190,000, but could probably be replaced for $75,000, and is partly insured.

While two young men named Erb and Shoecker, employed at Miller's dynamite factory at Summertown, Pa., were at work in Swamp creek near the factory mixing the ingredients of dynamite, an explosion ensued. The men were blown to pieces and fragments of flesh were scattered over the wide area. None of the pieces of flesh picked up were of sufficient size to show to what body they belonged. The factory buildings were injured, though the shock was felt in houses two miles from the scene.

The steamer Bristol, of the Old Colony line, was burned at her dock at Newport, R. I., and is a total loss. She arrived from N. York landed all her freight and her Fall River & Boston passengers, and then departed at the usual time for her destination. There was left on board the steamer only a few Newport passengers and their personal baggage. Just as the last passenger train was drawing out of the depot, fire was discovered on the steamer. The fire started near the kitchen, and spread with great rapidity, rendering futile all efforts to stop its progress. When the department arrived the flames had gained such headway that they could only be fought from the wharf side, while the great heat and flying sparks endangered buildings on the docks and steamers lying on either side of the wharf, and constant effort was required on the part of the firemen to prevent them from igniting. Insurance, $300,000, which covers the loss.

Talk About People.

A special from Carthage, Mo., announces the death of Col. John C. Dent, a brother-in-law of Gen. Grant, at an early hour on New Years' day. Col. Dent was Mrs. Grant's brother, and served with honor in the later war of the rebellion, as also through the Mexican war.

Petty Criminalities.

Burglars entered the residence of Jacob F. Worfel in Millersville, carried a safe weighing over a thousand pounds to the rear yard, and blew it open with dynamite, securing over six hundred dollars.

A farmer named Weymouth, living in Trenton township, across the river from Red Wing, Minn., has eloped with the wife of a neighbor, leaving behind his own wife and one child. The eloping couple went to St. Paul, and have not been heard from since.

Capt. A. E Bauer, drafting clerk in the secretary of state's office at Madison, Wis. committed suicide by shooting himself in the head. He has been for some time past failing mentally and has lately been given to frequent spells of despondency, Capt. Bauer was sixty years of age and has lived in Madison since 1870.

Mr. Andrew Squires, the Cleveland lawyer who went to London to secure $160,000 which Thomas Axworthy, Cleveland's defaulting treasurer, had deposited in a bank there, returned with the money. Axworthy is now on the ocean en route to Canada, where he will remain until he can enter the United States without fear of arrest.

Louis A. Horner, a city salesman in the employ of Henry Horner & Co., wholesale grocers, of Chicago is an embezzler of the firm's money to the extent of $20,000, and it is believed he has fled to Canada. Alderman Horner, one of the members of the firm and an uncle of Louis, left for Montreal, where he hopes to intercept the fugitive salesman.

John Morisoner, proprietor of the only saloon at Rawson, Ohio, has been repeatedly warned by White Caps to close but paid no attention to the threats. One night a party of men disguised as White Caps visited him and after demolishing the saloon whipped him until he begged for mercy and swore he would never go into the saloon business again.

Michael Crow, a plasterer, was stabbed in the left breast during an altercation with his brother-in-law, in New York and died soon after. Crow's assailant escaped at the time, but was subsequently arrested. This is the first murder of the new year, and the criminal stands a good chance of being the first to suffer death by electricity.

A man whose identity it was impossible to discover, committed suicide in a room in the Girard House at Philadelphia, by shooting himself in the month. Before killing himself the man destroyed everything about his person likely to establish his identity, even scratching the name of the maker off a pair of spectacle cases he carried.

Thomas Gorman, alias John Ross, eighteen years old, the self-confessed train robber and highwayman, who assaulted and robbed two women in New York and who afterwards shot at a detective who went to arrest him, was arraigned in court and held for trial. Gorman stated that he was implicated in a train robbery at Oshkosh and that he stole four gold watches in Philadelphia in one week.

Mrs. Harriett Burrow, of Philadelphia, who is charged with the murder of her husband, William Burrow, by disemboweling him with a razor in August last, prefers the gallows to the insane asylum. She claims that she is not insane, and has revoked the authority of Mrs. Carrie B. Kilgore to act as her attorney on the ground that she would present no defense except the plea of insanity.

Thomas Hayman of Dayton, Ky, after midnight was watching for chicken thieves, who had been troubling him. Seeing a man on the premises acting suspiciously he fired and the man fell, and died in a few hours. He was a neighbor, William Murdock. Before he died, Murdock declared that he was on his own premises when he was shot. Hayman is a traveling salesman for a St. Louis drug house. He has been arrested.

The police have received and traced to their origin letters which lead them to believe that "Jack the Ripper" is living in the vicinity of Drury Lane London. They do not accept the theory that the Whitchapel fiend had anything to do with the murder of little John Gill of Bradford, and seem confident that the old clue upon which they are now working will result in the murderer's capture in London.

Hronek, the anarchist convicted of conspiring to assassinate with dynamite Inspector Bonfield and Judges Gary and Grinnell, was refused a new trial at Chicago. The prisoner did not avail himself of the privilege of making a speech from the dock. No change could be noticed in Hronek's usual impressive manner when Judge Collins pronounced the sentence, twelve years in the penitentiary. A stay of sixty days was granted to allow the filing of a bill of exceptions.

Susan Schroop, the daughter of Jacob Schroop, the murderer of Antoine Schilling, visited the central station at Philadelphia, where she made a statement under oath, implicating both her father and stepmother. She stated that a few weeks ago the stepmother begged and coaxed her to place poison in Schilling's coffee, but she refused to do so, and Mrs. Scroop became very angry with her. After the statement was made Scroop denied that there was any truth in it, and called upon the daughter to also deny it, but she refused to do so.

William Clark, a saloonkeeper of Shelton W. T., was fatally stabbed by a woman named Lou Belma or "French Lou." She arrived at Shelton on the steamer Clara Brown from Olympia. Immediately on her arrival, in company with a man named Kelly, she went to Clark's saloon and passing through it entered a barber shop which is the same building. She either sent for Clark or he came into the shop where she was in company with Kelly. In a few moments cries for help attracted a crowd of men, who found Clark bleeding profusely from a wound in the left breast inflicted by the woman who was arrested.

It has been discovered that the vault of the United States subtreasury in the custom house of Baltimore was robbed of $1,243 in standard silver dollars. The discovery was made on April 15, last, but kept secret in the hope that the thief might be surprised and captured. No force was used, and it is apparent that the money was stolen by some one who handled the cash. The money was taken from fifty-five bags, which were sealed at the top. The thief had snagged each of the bags at the bottom abstracted a number of the coins, and then pinned up the rent. Dr. George W. Bishop, the United States assistant treasurer, who is in charge of the office, made the loss good as soon as he discovered it.

A dance was held at the house of George Browsel at Augusta, Wis. Some of the parties present had been drinking, and after mid-night, when it was proposed to take up a collection to pay the expense of the dance, Nathan Butler, a barber, did not contribute enough to suit the others. A fight ensued, and Butler was stabbed in the chest, it is supposed by August Schudder, a young man, who escaped in the confusion. An eye-witness who followed Schudder home is said to have seen in his possession a large jack knife covered with blood. Schudder was arrested and was jailed at Eau Claire, after pleading not guilty to the charge of assault with intent to kill. Physicians say Butler will die. The knife penetrated his lungs.

A stranger appeared at the window of the the money order department of the postoffice at Indianapolis, and told Chief Clerk Johnson, who was alone, that a gentleman in his buggy desired to see him. Johnson was persuaded to go out, but found the man wanted to see another Johnson. When he returned he found that the stranger had entered the office and filled his pockets with greenbacks. A curious incident in connection with the robbery is the fact that one of Mr. Johnson's assistants returned from dinner and saw the thief coolly picking up the money, and supposed the man was a special agent of the postoffice department. In the lobby fronting the money order department were half a dozen men engaged in writing out orders and registering letters. The thief was plainly visible to all of them, but so cool was the thief they thought he was an employee. The exact amount stolen is $2,468.

A year or two ago a rumor crept into print that Mr. Leighton, for many years clerk of the municipal court, of Boston was a defaulter to an amount of not less than $250,000. The rumor was emphatically denied by Mr. Leighton, and there was really not much ground for the story, except that an accountant was examining his books. The matter was dropped. The accountant was kept at work on Leighton's books, and he has been at work ever since. The result of his labors has not been made public, but it is understood that the deficiencies in the ex-clerk's account will be not much less than the amount before stated. The first offical reference to the matter was made by Mayor O'Brien. It was embodied in a veto of an order authorizing the expenditure of $18,000 for certain county expenses. Mr. Leighton is still living in style at his residence at the Back bay. He is reputed to be worth nearly $500,000.

A. J. Stillwell one of the wealthiest and most prominent citizens of Hannibal, Mo., was murdered in his house. Mr. Stillwell and his wife returned home about 11 o'clock one night from a party and retired soon afterward. At 2 o'clock Mrs. Stillwell was aroused by her husband's voice calling to her: "Fanny, is that you?" This was succeeded by the sound of something being whirled through the air and the footsteps of some one running away. Lighting the gas, Mrs. Stillwell discovered her husband lying on his bed in a pool of blood with a ghastly wound in his head. The neighbors were hastily notified, but on their arrival Mr. Stillwell was dead. In the alley were found Mr. Stillwell's pocket-book, $35 in money and the bloody axe with which the murderer had accomplished the deed. It is believed that the murderer was a burglar, who entered the house during Mr. and Mrs. Stillwell's absence and secreted until he thought they were sound asleep, and upon being interrupted by Mr. Stillwell killed him to avoid capture.

For eighteen centuries the Jewish people have shouldered the responsibility of the crucifixion of Jesus Christ, and, though theologians have from time to time attempted to palliate the act, it has remained for the pastor of the Jewish temple to trumpet forth to the world that the awful event supposed to have taken place on Calvary is all a myth. Saturday morning when addressing his congregation at the regular Sabbath day services Rabbi Alexander preached this remarkable theory, and undertook to prove further that it was Simon Peter and not the Savior who met the ignominious death recorded in Holy Writ. To say that the congregation was astonished but faintly expressed their feelings. They arose on the rabbi with such energy that he barely saved himself by a hurried exit through the back door. Then his flock fell to arguing the point among themselves. A general fight ensued, and the church furniture was circulating freely through the air when an officer entered and placed all he could get hold of under arrest under the charge of disturbing the peace. The rest escaped.

Higginbotham, a private banker of Manhattan, Kansas, has assigned to Samuel Kemball, Sr. His liabilities are $107,000, and assets which consists largely of real estate and live stock, $200,000. The largest creditors are the National Bank of Commerce of Kansas City for $38,000, and the above named assignee for $16,000. The bank was established in 1858.

All flouring mills in St. Louis, excepting one, closed down under the agreement entered into by the Millers' association at its late convention at Milwaukee. The exception is Anchor mill, which will also shut down as soon as it fills two or three important orders on hand. Under the agreement noted 250 mills in the fall wheat belt will either close down or run on half time during January.

George W. Hicks, vice-president and general manager of the St. Paul Distilling Company, who is in Philadelphia, said that the whisky trust having declared war against the St. Paul company by reducing the price of highwines 10 cents per proof gallon, his company would tomorrow make the price of highwines $1,01 per gallon, which is 3 cents under the figure named by the trust. The St. Paul house is owned and operated by men of the highest financial standing and ability in the Northwest.

The first case to prevent the fencing of the public domain ever brought on appeal was filed in the supreme court of the United States a few days since. It is the case of Marion Flaherty against the United States, brought on appeal from the supreme court of Montana. In 1883 Flaherty fenced in the west half of section 36, town 2, range 5 east, being in Gallatin county. The section was one which the law sets aside for school purposes, and both on this account and the fact that it was a part of the public domain which had not been settled by entry, it was held that Flaherty was a trespasser. Under the act of Feb. 25, 1885, the United States district attorney brought suit against Flaherty to compel him to take down his fences. Flaherty set up no claim to the land, but entered a demurrer to the jurisdiction of the court and the unconstitutionality of the law. The demurer was overruled, and Flaherty carried his case to the supreme court of the territory on the same pleadings where, the decision of the lower courts was sustained.

The Philadelphia Mystery Solved.

The mystery surrounding the finding of the mutilated remains of a murdered man in East Fairmount Park in Philadelphia has been solved. The corpse is identified and the murderer in prison. The murder is shown to have been a diabolical one. The motive for the deed was to obtain the money of the murdered man, but all that the murderer is known to have realized by his dastardly crime is $80. The case has baffled the police authorities since the finding of the body and many clues have been "run out."

A young man named Keefer, residing near Gillingham and Cadwallader streets in Philadelphia, saw a cut of the murdered man in one of the Sunday papers, which, he thought, resembled the features of a German named Schilling, who had lived with another German, named Schroop, at the corner of the above named streets. He imparted his suspicions to the police of that district, and was taken to the morgue, and on looking at the corpse he immediately identified it as that of Schilling. The police then brought Schroop's daughter to the morgue and she also recognized the body as that of her father's boarder, Antoine Schilling. Officers were then sent to Schroop's house and took him into custody. When the officers entered Schroop's house and informed him that they wanted him at the police station, the German exhibited the most abject terror, and when taken up the steps of the station house, his trembling limbs refused to support him and he fell. Several officers then carried him into the lieutenant's room. Schroop is about 50 years of age, and Schilling, his victim, was about 30 years old. The two men were partners in a small grocery and provision store at Gillingham and Cadwallader streets. Schroop lived in the house with his wife and daughter, and Schilling boarded with them.

By midnight Schroop had made a confession to Chief Detective Wood, in which he acknowledged killing Schilling. It was also learned that the daughter of Schroop had made a full confession, in which she acknowledged having tried to kill Schilling by administering a dose of laudanum. She gave him an overdose of the drug, which saved his life. It is believed that Mrs. Schroop is an accessory to the murder and butchery.

Death of a Desperado.

Detectives who have been hunting Tom Wallace, a member of the Hatfield gang of murderers, upon a requisition from Gov. Buckner of Kentucky, found him at Flat Top mountain. When the detectives ordered him to halt he drew a large revolver and opened fire. The detectives returned the fire, and Wallace fell to the ground mortally wounded. While the dying desperado breathed his last he confessed that he and Cap. Hatfield, the mountain demon, was paid $50 each by a deputy sheriff of Buchanan county, Va., for killing Capt. McCoy about two years ago. The murder money was placed in the hands of "Devil Ance" Hatfield, the father of Cap. and was paid to them after the bloody work was completed. Wallace was captured once before, but knocked the jailer down and escaped. His crime was a peculiarly horrible one. About two years ago Tom Wallace stole away Miss Daniels, a niece of Jeff McCoy, one of the sons of Herman McCoy, slain during the war. When the girl learned that she had been made the victim of a mock marriage, she left Wallace in Virginia and hid with her friends in Kentucky. Wallace gave Cap Hatfield $50 to help him recover the girl. The two men crossed the Tug and went to Mr. Daniel's cabin. The old man was sleeping in bed while his sick wife and one of her daughters slept in another. Failing to discover the hiding place of the fugative, Cap Hatfield wrapped the hairy part of a cow's tail about his fist and beat the invalid woman with the heavy stump until she was almost dead. Soon after Jeff McCoy was in Virginia, when he was seized near the mouth of Thacker creek, by Capt. Hatfield and Tom Wallace, who took him to the woods and prepared to kill him. McCoy's mother waded across the river and begged on her knees for the life of her son. She was kicked and sent back. Jeff struggled free from the cords that bound him, and leaping in the river, swam for his life. Wallace and Hatfeld stood on the West Virginia bank and kept up a fire on their victim. McCoy had reached the shore and was struggling up the bank. The young fellow had just taken the last upward bound when a bullet went through his head, and he fell on a tree stump below stone dead.

Great Fire in St. Louis.

The six-story brick building of the Richardson Drug company was reduced to ruins on New Year's morning. So fierce was the fire that five minutes after the alarm was turned in the buildings across the street were smoking and were about to burst into flames. Every few minutes a terrible explosion would detonate throughout the buildings and a graceful curl of fire, many feet in height and diameter, would leap high into the air and summon the reveling rioters of New Year's night to the scene of the destruction. When every pane of glass was out of the building the tongues of fire leaped out, and their heat made the narrow street a sheol for the gallant fireman who toiled with bursting, burning hose to save the property. Their coats smoked and their hands were blistered when exposed to the glare, and many dropped the lines and sought the shade of an adjacent building. It was a magnificent an awful sight from the first two minutes after its discovery until about three o'clock, when the building colapsed, and there was nothing more to burn. The building was erected several years ago, at a cost of 150,000. It was one of the largest wholesale drugstores in the country. The buildings in close proximity to the fire was scenes of tremendous excitement. The Ehler house, a place at 209 South Fourth street, occupied by boarders, was the scene of a panic. The screams of frightened women, and men rushing to-and-fro from room to room after their friends, created much terror. Finally the firemen came to their assistance, and all the occupants were safely rescued.

Andrew Geroghty, the night watchman in the Richardson drug house, has been missing since the fire, and it is believed that he perished in the burned building. The victim's widow and fourteen-year-old daughetr created a terrible scene at the ruins, pleading for a search for the remains in the still burning building.

Mr. Cliff Richardson, the general manager of the concern, gives the value of the stock on hand at about $675,000 and the insurance at $650,000. The buildings occupied were valued at about $200,000. The origin of the fire is not yet known.

The New Indian Bill.

Messrs. Nelson, Peel and Perkins, the subcommittee of the house committee on Indian affairs having in charge the appropriation bill, have finished their work and the bill is in the hands of the printer. Certain claims which may be added to the bill after it is placed in the hands of the full committee may swell the present total of the bill, which is about the same as last year's act. Very few changes in the existing condition of things are made, the bill being closely confined to appropriations for the support of the indians. One of the few changes provides adequate support for a Catholic Indian school for the White Earth agency in Minnesota by allowing the school one hundred Indian pupils at $150 per year each. Heretofore this school has been supported in part by contributions from the general fund which is supplied the commissioner of Indian affairs each year. Provision is also made for the support of Indian pupils at St. John's school and St. Vincent academy as last year. Changes are made in the administrative features of the Indian bureau only by authorizing the commissioner of Indian affairs to have made samples of clothing and blankets which will be used as the department standard for this work. Ordinarily it is the habit of a bidder to send in a sample of his goods with an agreement to make such a garment for such a price. This compels the Indian authorities to go through all of the samples and select such as they desire, and the cry of "favoritism" has been frequently raised. The new plan proposes to have bidders make their proposals upon the department standards. This action would prevent such difficulties as the Indian bureau has been lately having with Dobson & Co. of Philadelphia over some 1,800 pairs of blankets and which the board of Indian commissioners has been compelled to step in and settle. The claims which the committee are considering before insertion in the bill are simply Cherokee, Chickasaw and Choctaw claims which have been pending before congress for some time.

A Trunk Mystery.

A Chicago embezzler who packed himself and $10,000 in a trunk and was then sent by express to St. Louis, was captured in the city. His name is Thomas Vines, and he is the clerk in the employ of the Adams & Westlake Manufacturing company, who disappeared recently with the wages of seven hundred men. Vines confesses that he took the money, and with the aid of a confederate whom he refuses to name hired a room near the factory and made preparations, for flight. He blackened up as a negro, and secreting the money in old stockings threw them under some old clothes in the bottom of one of the biggest trunks that his accomplice could perchase. At night, when he thought the vigilance of the police was somewhat relaxed under a belief that he was already out of the city, Vines' confederate sent an expressman to their room, and Vines, in his negro disguise, helped the expressman load the trunk on the wagon. Five holes to give air for breathing, had been bored by the embezzler, in the back of the trunk near the lid, where openings would not be noticed. On the way to the depot. Vines told the expressman that he intended to beat his way to St. Louis by going in the trunk, being too poor to pay his railroad fare. The expressman thought it risky, but did not interfere when Vines opened the trunk, jumped in, and snapped the lid shut with a spring lock. The trunk was put in the baggage room by the expressman, the check for the trunk was in the possession of Vines' accomplice. Vines and the trunk went on board the train, and the embezzler and his $10,000 were treated as very common baggage for a distance of over a hundred miles. That was as long as the embezler could stand it. The air was stifling and he had been tumbled over and over until he was sore in every joint. On making an outcry he was released by the baggage man. They did not put him off the train, but sympathizing with his plea of poverty, allowed him to travel the remainder of the journey in a passenger car. The trunk was carelessly closed by the trainmen, and its contents left undisturbed. At St. Louis the trunk could not be obtained by Vines without the check, and his confederate did not put in an appearance. Considerable pity was expressed by the depot men for Vines, and a small collection was taken up to buy him a dinner and supper. His strange story reached the ears of the police and aroused their suspicions. Vines' description had been received from the Chicago authorities and a reading of it resulted in the dispatch of an officer to arrest the fugitive. Vines was taken into custody while begging the baggagemaster to disregard the usual regulation about checks and give up the trunk.

Living Without Food.

Josephine Bedard is a pretty, dark-eyed, vivacious French Canadian girl, who has been on a Christmas visit to her uncle and cousins at Lewiston, Maine, for the past few days. If her story is true she has fasted more than 2,550 days, having neither eaten nor desired to eat nor tasted food in any form for that length of time.

Her story, as told by herself, was that she was born on her father's farm in Tingwyck, a small agricultural town in Canada, in 1872. Her mother was stricken with a disease which terminated fatally when Josephine was but three months old. As a child she grew robust and strong. She attended a country school a short time, and afterward assisted in the household duties at home. On Christmas day, 1881, she was violently attacked with diphtheria, and for three weeks she was between life and death. From this sickness begins the date of her prolonged and curious fast, and today, as for years, her means of substance is derived from water only, which she drinks as people drink ordinarily. No form of eatables can arouse her sleeping appetite, and the most delicious fruits are no temptation to her.

Mr. Bedard said that when in Canada, in order to remove the doubts of all skeptical persons, Josephine was locked in a room for 15 days, as a test, with no nourishment but water, and that she came out at the end of that time without experiencing the slightest illness. A leading Montreal physican pronounced her a physical wonder, and offered Josephine's father $700 for the privilege of taking her into custody with a view to solving the cause of her peculiar condition. This Mr. Bedard refused to do. Several other inducements have been held out to her to travel as a curiosity; but she prefers to remain in her country home, where she has the care of her father's five children by a second wife, and where the onerous duties of a farm house devolve upon her.

Saved by Her Lover.

The mountain sections of North Carolina have recently become infested with numbers of Mormon missionaries who have gone there and are instituting an open system of prosylyting among people of that section. They have already made a number of converts to their faith whom they induce to accompany them to Utah, and several delegations have already left for the Mormon state. A short time ago four elders, having gained many converts, left with a party from Rutherford and other counties for Utah. These missionaries intensely appreciate the beauty of women, and an attractive woman is worth a premium in Utah. They converted Miss McCurry, and desired her to accompany her parents who were going to polygamous Utah. But love had previously thrown around her the witchery of its charms and she was engaged to a rustic swain. Her graceful figure, her facinating eyes, formed a picture of physical perfection, and Mormons guarded her as a precious prize for some rich Mormon. Her lover pleaded in vain to marry his betrothed, but her parents and the Mormons refused. On the night previous to their departure on the train, the resolute lover, with shotguns, collected a group of young men, charged the guard and captured his imprisoned and beautiful sweetheart, whom he soon made his bride. The angry father followed in vain pursuit and left next day without his daughter. The people of the western section of the state are in a high state of excitement and indignation at the high-handed measures of the Mormons, and the proselyting elder was a few days ago expelled from Davies county, on pain of being tarred and feathered if he remained.

Suppressing Mexican Priests.

A Herald dispatch from El Paso, Tex., says: "El Paso is greatly excited over the details of the news that has just been received of the great clerical rising in the City of Mexico, and the utter and bloody defeat of the clericals. It seems, Father Joso Gasper, a well known priest, hurried to the national place and asked immediate and secret conference with President Diaz. What he disclosed is not known, but a few minutes afterward warrants of arrest were made out for a large number of prominent people, but when the officers went after them not one of them could be found. At 11 o'clock that night an immense mob attacked the national palace joined and reinforced by the garrison of at least three barracks and some parks of artillery. The conflict was fierce and bloody, but the government held its own and gained the victory. Three generals and several high officers were killed. The government took over two thousand prisoners at the fighting. Seventy-two priests were among the slain, which numbered during the first onslaught 250. Next day 200 priests were arrested and ordered shot, among them the archbishop. A number of women got petitions to have them reprieved, but it is not thought that they met with success. Great excitement prevails in Chihuahua, where Gov. Laura Carillo called at once the state legislature together and all priests to be arrested. It seems to have been the last effort of the clerical party against the government.

Police Officer Henry Fehle died a horrible death at St. Louis from hydrophobia. Last September while walking his beat he was bitten on the right leg by a dog, but thought nothing of the wound, recently the leg began to swell, and Fehle was taken down with violent symptoms of hydrophobia. He passed from one convulsion into another, and finally died in great agony. Dr. Bernays, who attended him, says, the case was genuine hydrophobia.

Mrs. Turner and her little daughter, also a daughter of George Cloyd, three Brooks brothers and a man whose name is unknown, all colored, attempted to cross the river from Kentucky to Ohio in a small flat-bottomed boat. At some distance from the shore waves from two passing steamboats upset their little craft and all seven occupants were drowned. Their cries for help were heard by persons on the steamboats, but darkness prevented the rendering of any assistance. All of those who perished lived in Kentucky. Not one of the bodies has yet been recovered.

A three-year-old child of L. P. Olson of East Sioux Falls died from dropsy and preparations were made to bury the child, but as the ground was very slippery from the recent sleet storm it was postponed until the next day. That night the body showed evidence of returning life. Color frequently came into different parts of the body and entirely disappeared. There were also other evidences of life. The funeral was indefinitely postponed until it is decided whether or not the child is dead. Dozens of doctors have examined the body, but none will authorize the burial of the child.

Warned by White Caps.

It is reported that the White Caps have again appeared at New Rochelle, N. Y. According to the latest story, Henry Seabright was returning from a party. He was driving in a buggy with a young lady. Shortly after 11 o'clock three men appeared in the road. One of them grasped the horse's bridle, while the second, it is alleged, presented a revolver, and the third spoke as follows: "We hereby warn both of you to stay in the house evenings and not go into society so much. Do this or beware of the White Caps and their vengeance." When the White Cap had finished speaking the horse was released, and the young people in the carriage continued on their way home. Mr. Seabright, it is said, has already had two experiences with these so-called regulators. The only reason for stopping him and the young lady is that the White Caps (if they are such) think that he is wasting his time in the evenings by attending parties and other like entertainments. Before the White Caps allowed Mr. Seabright to proceed on his way both he and the young lady were made to promise that they would go less into society. They made this promise fearing personal violence in case they should refuse. The name of the young lady who accompanied Mr. Seabright is with-held by request. Since the White Caps first made their appearance the young ladies in New Rochelle have really been afraid to go about in the evening. It is not probable the New Rochelle authorities will undertake any decisive measures until they have committed other outrages like those in Ohio.

White Caps have begun business in Chicago. They have not also yet had time to carry out their threats, but the following letter has been received by every alderman who has cast a vote for an elevated road: "Chicago and Cook county White Caps. For purity in in politics, an honest government, suppression of vice, death to anarchy, death to conspirators, death to boodlers. First Notice —Sir: Beware! You remember the boodlers' punishment. The doors of Joliet are not yet closed. You are spotted. Your course in the council has been closely watched. Take warning; therefore, ere it be too late, how you vote in future, or the grand jury will call for you: If not, we shall attend to your case. Chicago and Cook County White Caps."

Labor Riots Near Seattle.

Trouble arose at New Castle, a little mining town near Seattle, W. T., over a Miners' union man, William Doyle, being shown preference over a Knight of Labor man. The Knights of Labor, headed by the Mularkey brothers, very determined men, began an attack upon the Miners' union. Soon after breakfast they brought a force of thirty Knights of Labor from Gilman, a mining town near by, and cutting the telegraph wires between Renton and Seattle, stationed sentinels in different parts of New Castle and begun assaulting the day shift at the mines, refusing to let the night shift out of the shaft. The attacking party afterward boarded the train and rode to Coal Creek, where the train was to load with coal. The regular force of the miners' union were then attacked by the Knights with every kind of missile. The train was upon the trestle and some of the leaders were driven and thrown off falling 70 feet or more. When the train pulled backed to Newcastle the Knights boarded it, and at Newcastle began an assault upon the miners union men at the depot. Duncan Buchanan, a foreman was very badly injured. Terrance Mularkey was using his Winchester upon the unionists, so the miners' union men fled to their home across the commons between their cottages and the depot and securing their rifles opened fire on the Knights of Labor. Three men fell. Sheriff Cochrane, with a posse, went to New Castle, and as fighting was very fierce and several men injured, he dispatched a courier to Seattle with orders for militia. Companies D and E, First regiment, under Col. J. C. Haines, boarded a special train, but when about a mile out the eccentric of the engine broke and they had to return. Last reports from Newcastle say the trouble is over.

A letter has been received from Arkansas City, Kan., from Springer, Pottawatomie county, Oklahoma, stating that the town was laid out Dec. 31, and Indian Territory cattlemen elected town officers. Dec. 10, 14 Oklahoma boomers were captured by Lieut. Macomb and a posse of 20 Indian scouts, but two days later the boomers were released on orders from some superior authority, and they are now in the "promised land" and have taken up claims. The band was headed by Capt. Summers, government freight agent at Oklahoma Station, and he and his followers propose to hold Springer at all odds. Dec. 13 the population of the place was not more than 50, but Dec. 31 it was at least 5,000.

A. C. Roberts, a tough citizen of Genoa, Nebraska, was given a dose of reform at the hands of Nebraska regulators, which will probably make a lasting impression on his mind. He has been in the habit of insulting ladies on the street, and one night, entered the apartment of two ladies, who were compelled to flee in order to escape him. He was arrested and put in jail. About midnight a body of masked men took him to the woods near town, put a rope around his neck, and, throwing one end over a stout limb, pulled him up five times. He was still breathing when lowered the fifth time, and the regulators decided to spare his life. They left him lying on the ground with a note pinned on his clothes, telling him to leave the country as soon as he came to. He has not been seen since.

A warrant was issued at Brainerd for the arrest of Gustof Keil, charged with assaulting Ferdinand Nahring with an axe. The fracas occurred three miles from Schwartz's brick yard, where the men were engaged in cutting wood. A dispute arose and Keil struck Nahring with the blade of an axe, splitting his face from his forehead to his chin, cutting him between the eyes and down through the nose. The sheriff is after Keil, who is hiding in the woods.

John W. Jones, editor of the St. Cloud Tribune, who is reported as having left St. Cloud heavily in debt is now in Faribault. Evidently there is some mistake. Mr. Jones is a young man who bears a good reputation; he was connected with the Faribault Democrat for several years before he went to St. Cloud, and if his business venture at St. Cloud has failed his creditors will not lose anything, as he has friends who will gladly help him out of any financial embarrassment.

At a meeting of the board of directors of the Southern Minnesota Fair association held in Rochester it was decided to hold the next annual fair the first week of September next, from the 2d to 7th inclusive. The annual meeting of the stockholders of the association will be held soon, at which time five directors will be chosen and reports read by the officers of the association. The meeting will be of unusual interest by reason of the discussion of important questions. One of these is the proposition to hold public sales for all kinds of stock, monthly, on the grounds of the fair association.

Graves and Reapportionment.

Special to The Journal.

St. Paul, Jan. 7, 1889. At the republican caucus, held at the House of Representatives Chamber at the State Capitol, this evening, Col. C. H. Graves was elected speaker of the House by a vote of 50 for Graves to 36 for Morgan. The Washburn men having forced the Senatorial fight upon the Speakership, this is considered a black eye for Washburn. The Sabin men are jubilant to-night, while Washburn's forces are correspondingly gloomy. The Fifth District wins a victory that is a long stride toward re-apportionment. Hurrah for Graves and the old Fifth.

Virtue Hath Its Reward.

At the Republican Senatorial caucus on Monday night our old friend Ex-Sheriff, W. F. Zwickey, was elected Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms. This is a deserved recognition of his former services to the party and his many friends are heartily congratulating him upon his deserved success. Mr. Zwickey will be a creditable official.

Decease of the Democrat.

Editor Dewey Finally Throws up the Sponge, not Finding Duluth a good Democratic Town.

Duluth Tribune.

About two years ago a very bright and enterprising newspaper appeared at Brainerd, published and edited by A. Dewey. The expense of publishing a daily newspaper of the size and spirit of the News was much too large for that community, but Mr. Dewey with his well known courage and industry kept at the front and it became the most influential among the state newspapers in its support of the renomination of Governor McGill. The fire that swept off two blocks of that city included the building in which the News was located and Marder, Luse & Co., who held a claim against the plant, asked for immediate payment. To relieve himself of this Mr. Dewey sold one-half of the plant to a syndicate of democrats in Duluth, and it was removed to this city and established with A. M. Miller, Jr., in the editorial charge, with Mr. Dewey at the head of the mechanical department. The adventure proved a losing concern, and the daily closed its brief career in November, and yesterday the interest controlled by Dewey was turned over to the mortgagee. Mr. Dewey was induced to go into the Brainerd experiment by C. F. Kindred, and loses about $8,000 in the entire deal.

Railroads Arguing for Land.

A hearing was had before Gov. McGill, Attorney General Clapp and Auditor Bradey yesterday afternoon on the application of the Duluth & Winnipeg Railway company for the issuance of patents on the land due on the first twenty miles of their road. The application is opposed by the St. Paul, Brainerd & Northwestern and the Manitoba road. During the past fall the Duluth & Winnipeg company built twenty miles of its road from Cloquet up the St. Louis River, and it has been reported on by commissioners who inspected it as completed in first-class shape. The company now asks for patents on the lands due on the first twenty miles, and, as there are adverse interests, they ask that patents for the whole amount issue and that all save a small amount be deposited in trust to await judicial determination. The hearing before the governor yesterday was to determine whether this should be done or not. Gov. McGill asked whether the counsel for the various parties interested could agree to submit a case to be taken to the supreme court by the attorney general to set aside the deeds, if delivered to the Duluth & Winnipeg. There was a general discussion on this point and an agreement was reached to meet at the attorney general's office this morning to stipulate the case. As the state has considerable interests involved, it is not unlikely that it will be heard from before the question reaches the supreme court.

What Next?

Northwestern Congregationalist.

An editorial with this caption in a recent number of the Northwestern has been severely criticised in certain quarters for not pronouncing upon some particular line of policy to be adopted in reference to further temperance legislation. It will be seen from the views of prominent citizens published elsewhere, that we have some support in our attitude of hesitancy regarding the adoption of any one particular measure as of greater importance than all others. We are ready to uphold any and every measure which shall promote the good of the temperance cause, only let that measure receive, as the main condition of its successful agitation, the general support of Christian people throughout the state. We take this position, not from lack of conviction, but from a sincere desire to co-operate with all true citizens in what-ever shall seem for the best interests of the state.

So far as we are able to discover, from reading the exchanges which come to this office and from conversing with public men, the present state of affairs in regard to temperance reform in Minnesota stands about like this. For two years we have had a fair trial of high license. While in some localities the result has not been such as was hoped for, it is unquestionably true that the state as a whole has been benefitted and the liquor traffic to a large degree restrained. At the same time, no one looks upon high license as an ultimatum. It is not even regarded as a resting-place in the work. Local option by townships, where it has been enforced, has proved of great good. The trouble has been that adjoining towns, where the traffic has not been prescribed, have imported liquor into these prohibitory localities. It is claimed that local option by counties will greatly reduce this evil. The country districts, taken by themselves, would doubtless give a majority for a prohibitory law. The large towns and cities, however, where the difficulty of coping with the drink evil is greatest, would certainly not sustain such a law. Even those who are most urgent in demanding a prohibitory enactment admit that the public sentiment of the state as a whole is not in favor of such a law.

The question then narrows itself to this: Shall we move for an absolute prohibitory law in the face of this laxity of public sentiment, or shall we adopt more widely extended and more rigidly enforced restrictive measures. It seems to us, however impatient may be our desire to see Minnesota enrolled among the prohibition states, that it is the part of wisdom to pursue the latter corse.

We venture the following suggestions: First, the active interest of every Christian citzen in this question. Second, the laying aside of all party differences in the endeavor to rid the state of the saloon influence. Third, the personal concern of every citizen in seeing that the laws which we already have, are strictly enforced. Fourth, that steps be taken to secure from the next legislature either an increase of the present license rate, the privilege of local option for counties, or a law forbidding the use of liquor on the premises where it is sold. (Would that all three of these ends might be secured!) This we believe will prepare the way for the adoption of a prohibitory law or constitutional amendment which shall prove an honor, and not a disgrace, to our beloved state.

Verndale Journal: Nothing can be said in favor of Mr. Washburn's great services to the development of the Northwest, and especially Minnesota, which can not easily be surpassed by the achievements of Senator Sabin. Mr. Washburn's greatest qualification is found in his business career, and has not Senator Sabin demonstrated his ability in this department of public activity? Furthermore, Senator Sabin has been a favorite representive of the Northwest in the councils of the republican party, has contributed much to republican success in Minnesota, and numbers among his supporters in this state many of the men who have largely contributed to the recent triumphs of the republican party in Minnesota. In his public acts and utterance, he has shown his desire to subserve the interests of, and his confidence in, the people of this commonwealth. He has been a man of action rather than words; and the best evidence of his good judgment is the reliance placed in him by his fellow senators. He has been able to inspire this without any great outward show, which is a thorough demonstration of the fact that he has strong personal influence over those with whom he is associated. Is it not well that we should continue in a public position of supreme importance a man who has thus signally shown his ability and eagerness to serve his constituents? We think so; and it is our belief that the people's representatives in the state legislature will so decide.

Grain Inspection.

Duluth Daily Tribune.

The matter of inspection of grain is beginning to trouble the wheat men again somewhat. Of course it is too late to hope for any improvement in the rules this year. Even if it were not too late the set of incapables that now compose the commission could not be expected to help Duluth against Minneapoles' but a strong and concentrated effort will be made by the Duluth dealers this winter, to secure something like a square deal for Duluth.

One of the chief causes of complaint is that Minneapolis, is allowed the benefit of the state inspection without being obliged to conform strictly to the laws. The present commissioners, if they do not actually connive at the practice, at least must be fully aware that "mixing" is almost publicly done at Minneapolis and the mixed wheat is graded by their inspectors as if it were just from the country. From the nature of the trade at Duluth, this cannot be done, nor do the Duluth dealers desire that it should be done. All the elevators at Duluth are public warehouses and subject to the state laws, but at Minneapolis they are not. There a car of wheat comes on track, it is graded by the state say as 1 northern. This car is then switched to an unlicensed house, where enough 1 hard is mixed with it and then put back on the shipping track. Along comes Mr. Inspector and grades this wheat 1 hard, although he knows that it has been into a "mixing house." This species of "faking" cannot be done at Duluth. The grain comes out the cars, goes into the bins as it is graded, and from there into the ship' and there is no monkey business about it.

The present inspector here, Mr. Shely, is very popular and implicitly relied on by all the grain men here. He is an able and conscientious man, well up in his business, but he is not the head boss of the concern. The grain men are determined to assert their rights, and the chances are that some legislation during the coming session will be affected which will compel the commissioners to grant justice to Duluth.

Verndale Journal: It is generally conceded upon all sides, that the speaker of the house should be a man of experience in legislative bodies as well as a man of ability. So much depends upon the discernment of the speaker and his promptness in rendering decisions, that if he is not a fine parliamentarian and very alert, he cannot hold the business of the session in hand and secure the confidence of the house, without which legislation is necessarily brought to a stand-still, and much delay is occasioned. Whereas this thorough command of the situation may readily be gained by members of the legislative body, it is not often possessed by those who have had no legislative experience. Col. Grave's well known qualifications, by reason of ability and experience, for the speakership, should give him many supporters among those who desire that the necessary legislation to be enacted this winter may not be hindered or prevented by any incompetence on the part of the speaker. This is but one of several reasons which should influence the house to select Colonel Graves as its presiding officer.

The Next Speaker.

Something as to the Life and Services of Charles H. Graves.

Charles H. Graves, of Duluth, the successful candidate for speaker of the house of representatives, was born in Massachusetts in 1839, and received a common school education. In 1861 he enlisted as a private in the 40th New York volunteers and served in the army till the end of the war. He was successively promoted to the rank of lieutenant, captain, major, lieutenant-colonel and colonel, and at the end of the war was given a commission of first lieutenant in the regular United States army. In 1866 he was promoted to the rank of captain and brevetted major and lieutenant-colonel. During the following year he left the service and removed to Minnesota and has since resided in this state having lived a period of 19 years in Duluth, and always been a staunch Republican. During his residence in this state he has had a long and successful business and political cereer. He served in the state senate for four years, beginning in 1873 and ending in 1876. He was mayor of Duluth in 1881 and 1882, and a delegate-at-large from Minnesota to the republican national convention in 1884. He was elected to the state legislature from the Forty-fifth senatorial district at the last November election by a majority of 5,000.
